

Prof's book receives award

"The World Copper Industry," by University economist Raymond Mikesell, was recently selected as one of the outstanding academic books of 1980 by Choice, the publication of College and Research Libraries.

"I was a little surprised that it was selected as an outstanding academic book," Mikesell said. "Most of those who use it are members of mining companies or are involved with mining economics."

Mikesell's book gives a comprehensive overview of the world copper industry. He discusses how copper prices are determined, how much competition exists, substitution and its effects on prices, and long-run supply and demand.

He also considers price stabilization, recycling and environmental problems.

Concern over the copper supply has resulted from expropriation of mines, environmental regulations for smelters and the last decade's wildly fluctuating prices. Mikesell concludes from his analysis of the copper industry that:

•A copper cartel similar to OPEC will be unprofitable because of elasticities of demand.

•The outlook for international prices does not appear encouraging.

It is likely copper prices will rise sharply in the mid-1980's because of increased demand and investment in mines.

Mikesell's interest in copper arose out of research in foreign mineral investments which dates from his association with the Presidents' Materials Policy Commission in 1951-52.

Mikesell was recently appointed a member of the National Materials Advisory Board, which serves under the National Academy of Sciences and the National Research Council. NMAB's purpose is to identify critical issues concerning minerals that need further research. Mikesell will attend the board's biannual meeting in Washington for the first time this June.
