 Campus security diligently tickets drivers who overstay their time at one of the University's 300 parking meters.

For students who drive
Parking remains plentiful

On-campus parking is plentiful if students don't mind paying and walking.

Year-long parking permits cost $18 for students, and although a specific parking space isn't assigned, student parking lots rarely fill to capacity.

Richard Tanner, associate director of public safety, says he can remember only two times when the student parking lot across from the Bean dorm complex has been filled: during an Elvis Presley concert at Mac Court and during the 1980 Olympic Trials.

Most lots are at least three blocks away from academic buildings. Three hundred metered spaces are closer, but the ones nearest the building (by the EMU or the Bookstore) have two-hour meters while ones a little further away (across from Hayward Field, in front of the library) have a five-hour limit.

The fine for parking in a permit-only lot without a permit is $5 and the fine at metered spaces is $4. Fines, if unpaid, can be deducted from a student's general deposit or a faculty or staff member's salary.

Cars rarely are towed from campus unless they are parked in a fire lane, in front of a fire hydrant or in a reserved space or one marked "handicapped only" and the owner requests the tow, Tanner says.

"We're not in the towing business," he says, adding that the office has a contract with a private towing service. "Our job is strictly enforcement."

All the money from tickets and parking permits go to make the parking program self-supporting. The public safety department collected more than $250,000 last year for the program, Tanner says.

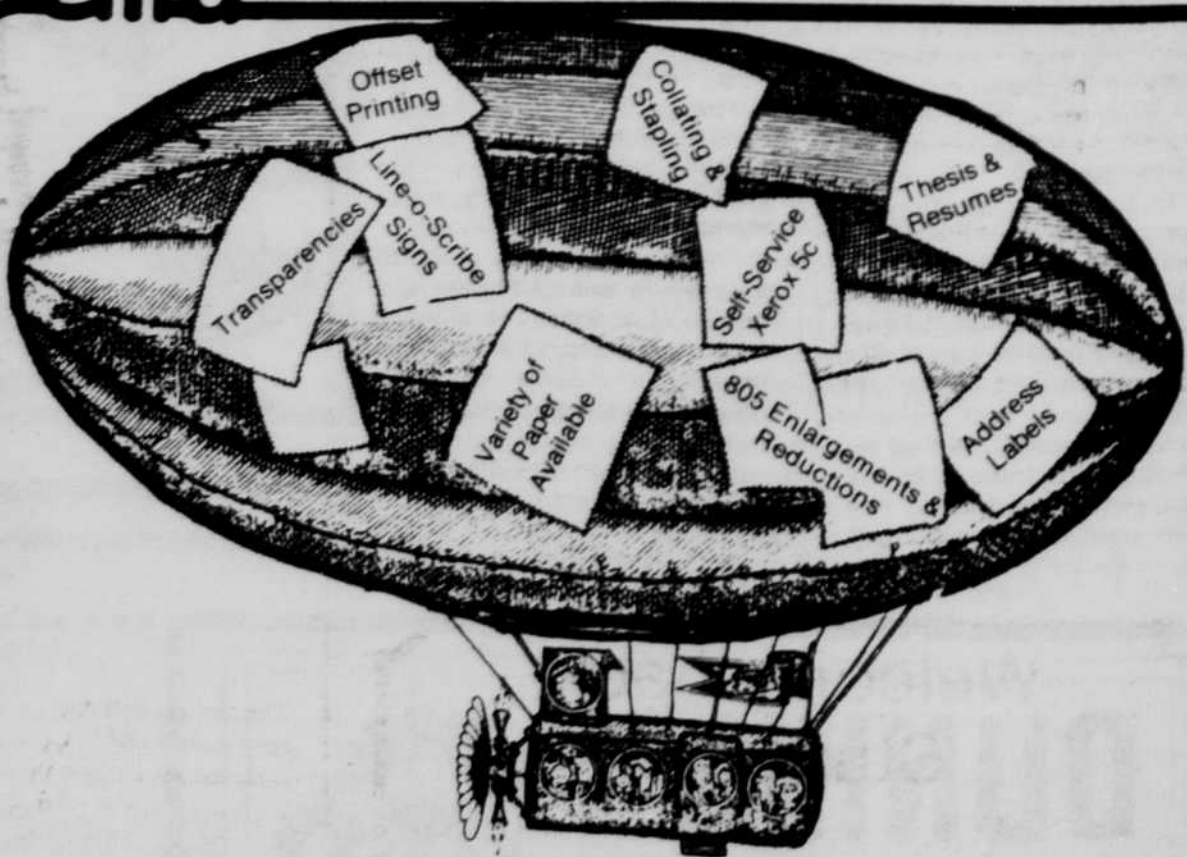

The current campus parking cost is lower than downtown parking fees and is the same as the 1980-81 school year, Tanner says.

Single-term permits are $7.50 for students and $15 for faculty and staff members. Full-year faculty and staff parking permits are $36.

Bicycle permits are required on campus and cost $2. Unregistered bikes will be ticketed, then impounded by campus security.

Student parking permits and bicycle permits are available in the EMU Ballroom during fall registration and from campus security in Straub Hall during regular office hours. For more information call 686-5444.
