Student selected for U.N. fall program

Melissa Mills, a University political science student from Ashland, is one of 35 undergraduates from 20 states attending the second United Nations Semester in New York this fall.

Mills is part of a group of undergraduates representing 30 universities from throughout the nation selected competitively for the program. The National Collegiate Honors Council and Long Island University's Brooklyn Center are co-sponsoring UN Semester II, which runs through Dec. 23.

Offered with the cooperation of the United Nations, UN Semester II involves fieldwork and seminars on the theme of internationalism. Participants will visit the United Nations and international communities in the New York area in the course of their studies.

Seminar subjects include conflict mediation, urban folk-life, immigrant population, international issues in economics and politics, and human rights.

The United Nations Semester is one of a series of educational projects sponsored by the National Collegiate Honors Council. For each program, a specific theme is chosen, and an institution of higher education in an appropriate region of the United States hosts the event.

Mills, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Merle Mills, was selected the 1980 Harry S. Truman Scholar for Oregon.
