"Children can handle a lot more responsibility than we normally give them," she says. "but there must be training before that responsibility is placed on them. If they are suddenly faced with a lot of responsibility that they aren't accustomed to, they won't be able to handle it."

Magnet Arts caters to "regular students," so the faculty must assume each student will behave in a liable manner.

The grade school, just like the big universities, also feels the sharpness of budget cuts. The rumors are that Magnet Arts will be forced to either move from the building it now shares with the Condon Elementary School or discontinue its program all together.

"The school board has a task force studying the effectiveness of the various programs," Curran says. "We (the alternative schools) seem to get evaluated more often than the regular neighborhood schools. If their goal is to drop the whole program, it's a sad commentary on our educational system."

"Physically picking up and moving seems unlikely," she says. "Moving to another building holds no appeal. We feel that this building is perfect for our program. It has historic value and besides, where else are we going to find wooden floors for dancing?"
