State law stiffens the penalties for first-offense drunk drivers

People who like to drink have another good reason not to climb behind the wheel of a car.

Effective Nov. 1, HB 2010, a new state law, cracks down on drunk drivers.

First offenders now face a mandatory one-year license suspension, up to $1,000 fine, and one year in jail.

If convicted a second time, offenders receive a three-year license suspension, car impoundment and the possibility of fines or incarceration.

The second-time offender may apply for an occupational license only after he passes an examination by the Oregon Mental Health Division proving that he is not a problem drinker.

If a third offense occurs within five years of the first, the offender's license is revoked for 10 years.

Yet another offense within five years and the driver loses his license for three more years. The penalties include car impoundment, fines and the possibility of imprisonment. But this time an occupational license can't be applied for in 90 days.

Gil Bellamy, Oregon Traffic Safety Commission administrator, calls the bill "revolutionary."

"Few states have enforced legislation this strict," he says.

California is one state that has cracked down on drunk drivers. An organization called Mothers Against Drunk Drivers pushed for the strict changes in that state's laws. Candy Lightner began organizing the group, which now has 30 chapters in nine states, after her daughter was killed by a drunk driver.

Oregon doesn't have an official chapter yet, but Carol Satterfield of Beaverton is working on it. "We're in the process of becoming a chapter. We have authorization from MADD, and now we're getting the paper work finished," Satterfield said.

Satterfield would appreciate response from any interested person or organization. She can be contacted at P.O. Box 1907, Beaverton, OR.
