People's Law School converts legal lingo into layman's terms

TRACI WALTON
Of the Emerald

You see your neighbor at the store and notice that as he's leaving, he backs into your car. You arrive home just in time to see his dog eating your prize-winning tulips and his son throw a baseball through your living room window. Showing his community spirit, your neighbor refuses to pay for the damage.

You have three choices. You can drink your dinner that night. You can get an ulcer worrying about legal fees.

Or you can attend the People's Law School's session on small claims court and learn what your rights and responsibilities are, and how to proceed on your own.

The People's Law School was started 10 years ago by University law school students. According to Sue Heini, of Lane County Legal Aid, law students who feel "isolated by rigorous study" get a chance to apply what they've learned by participating in the sessions.

"Many people are intimidated by the law, primarily because of the complex language that is used," Heini says. The People's Law School's goal is to "demystify the law by translating blackboard concepts into layman's terms."

Lane County Legal Aid acts in an administrative capacity, Heini says. They have staff attorneys available as a resource for students and the University Student Bar Association provides funds for printing and mailing information.

Recently, about 40 people attended a session entitled, "Taking Your Case to Small Claims Court." Four law students — Bob Needham, Debra Dorman, Steve Dingle, and Marc Tanzer — reviewed the entire small claims procedure from filing for damages to collecting damages awarded by the court.

Dingle opened the discussion by explaining that the purpose of Small Claims Court is to settle claims for money, property, or damages valued under $700 with minimal trouble and expense.

"The philosophy behind it is that it's a people's court. No lawyers are allowed in the courtroom," he said.

One young couple who own their own landscaping firm said the session will be a big help to them in running their business.

Because every dollar is vital to a small business, the couple are concerned about how to collect overdue accounts. Dealing with busy officials who are unwilling to take the time to explain legal procedures is very frustrating, they say.

And they strongly agree with Heini's statement that the People's Law School is an "invaluable resource for the community to use."
