The morning after:

Waking up is hard to do

Glumph.

It's morning. The sun makes its only appearance of the day, and streams onto your face. Ooh. Your head is buzzing from all the fun you had last night. Mmmm. Snuggle back into bed. It's the weekend, and it's OK to sleep in.

Suddenly you hear the rustle of sheets next to you. A sleepy face under a bunch of tousled hair croaks out "Good morning."

All moral aspects aside, it's become a common thing for perfect dates to last longer than one evening. In such cases, certain questions must be raised.

Like what's the proper way to say good morning when your mouth tastes like something crawled in there and died?

Or what happens if your partner is (heaven forbid!) a morning person, and you're not?

Most importantly, what should you do the morning after?

Even if you've known your date for years, waking up with someone in the sometimes harsh light of day can be a harrowing experience. Even if they are perfect. Even if they are your spouse.

It seems that five out of ten people act horrible when they first crack open their eyelids. An encounter with one of these morning monsters can be sobering, especially after a particularly wonderful evening.

For your own safety, give the grump some space. Go take a shower, make some coffee, brush your teeth, chat with the roommates, feed your goldfish. Then play hotel and bring up some coffee. That'll de-grumpify 'em every time.

Or if you really want to have fun, crack open a bottle of champagne, drag the boob tube upstairs or wherever. Spend the morning with Bugs Bunny, Spiderman and Cold Duck.

If it's a Sunday, you might want to forget the television. Oral and Jerry will only make you feel guilty. (Whether you should or not is another matter.)

What's fun about the morning after is that you can extend the perfect date even longer. For instance, to clear out some of the cobwebs you might do something athletic together... outside. Go jogging, play tennis or racquetball, go swimming. Maybe head up to the Cougar hot springs, or go skiing, or take a hike.

Eating is always a good idea. Eugene has many great breakfast places. The Homefried Truckstop, Blair Island, The Dayspring Cafe, and the Keystone Cafe all present nice, low-key morning meals that allow you to ease into the day.

Then again, you can always stay in bed.

coast, and the mountains are all about two hours away. If your partner likes the idea, run up to Portland for the evening. Get some fresh seafood at the coast. (Watch the sun set while you roast marshmallows around a warm fire. Maybe snuggle a bit.) Or just go for a nice drive in the mountains, stopping for some dinner and maybe a dip in some hot springs.

The possibilities are endless, provided you've got the time, the imagination and the wheels.

There are lots of things to do both inside and outside the Emerald City. Just use your imagination and strive for style. And maybe practice your Springsteen imitation.

there is no truth to the rumor that OSU has retaliated by distributing 4000 Guernseys at the U of O campus this morning.

thanks to Caroline Petrich and Max DeRungs for their photogenicity and senses of humor. thanks again, Mark!
and, of course, all my love to my Perfect Date.
