

Hackles rise over law center studiers

A fight for study space in the University law library is turning into a dispute over territorial rights between law students and "outsiders."

Intended for use as a resource and information center, the law library has had problems with undergraduates looking for a place to study.

"Anyone using the law library as a general study center has no business being there," says Lorrie Skurdahl, a third-year law student. "There's nobody to enforce that except law students—and they just may."

Confusion over the purpose of the Labor Education and Research Center and the Institute for Social Science Research is also abundant. Neither is intended to be used as a general study center.

'Selectrics' replace library's 'klunkers'

Just in time for fall term papers, the University library has installed three new IBM Selectric typewriters. The one hitch is that 15 minutes costs 10 cents and 45 minutes costs a quarter.

"We've had a nagging problem of old 'klunkers'," says George Shipman, University librarian.

Shipman says the way around replacement costs for the manual 'klunkers' was to "let them pay for themselves."

The typewriters will be in the typing rooms on the second and third floors of the library.

The idea is neither new or innovative, Shipman says. "We've had them before, about 10 years ago we even had coin-operated calculators."

Former law dean honored

Eugene Scoles, professor and former dean of the University law school, will be honored at a retirement dinner at the Valley River Inn Wednesday, Dec. 2, at 8 p.m.

The guest speaker at the dinner will be Albert Sacks, former dean of the Harvard law school and currently the president of the American Association of Law Schools. Scoles is a past president of the AALS.

"Eugene Scoles is the man responsible for bringing the law school to its current modern status," says Derrick Bell, University law school dean.

Scoles will retire in May 1982.
