This car, parked on 15th Street between Alder and Hilyard streets, was given a squeeze Monday at about 4 a.m. as a tree fell under the weight of its snow-piled branches. Many trees toppled Monday due to winds and snow, including more than five on campus.

University readies beds, food just in case staff needs to stay

The snow brought more than white flakes to those involved in registering University students. The snow also brought slick roads and sloppy weather, causing some problems in staffing McArthur Court for the two-day winter term registration.

In order to ensure registration would continue through Tuesday and that University staff would not be required to travel in dangerous weather conditions, Muriel Jackson, the president's administrative assistant, put a "contingency plan" into effect in case of more snow.

"If there are difficulties," Jackson said, "we have lined up 100 sleeping spaces in the dorms and 30 spaces in the student health center.

"It's mostly a 'here's a blanket, there's a chair' arrangement," she added.

There also were arrangements for feeding employees both dinner Monday night and breakfast Tuesday morning, if the need arose, Jackson said.

"If we were to get a dump like last night, before this evening, we'll enact the plan," she said Monday.

"There is also a clause in the classified staff contracts about dangerous weather conditions so that we may excuse employees early with pay," Jackson said.

Jackson confirmed late Monday afternoon that the plan probably "wouldn't happen."
