

AAA Dean picked

Wilmot "Bill" Gilland, 48, acting dean for the University architecture and allied arts school since July, has been named dean of the school, according to Richard Hill, provost and academic vice president.

Gilland was head of the architecture department in the school from 1972 to 1977. His primary areas of interest are design process and methodology, form-context relations and architectural education.

"Bill Gilland's prior administrative experience in the school and his dedication to its mission equip him especially well for this position," Hill says. "He understands and appreciates the interaction of the various components of the school and is thoroughly familiar with its history and development," he adds.

Gilland replaced Robert Harris, now architecture dean at the University of Southern California.

Gilland joined the Oregon faculty in 1969, after teaching in the department of architecture at the University of California, Berkeley. He was acting head of the UO architecture department for one year before being named head.

Advisors chosen

Four Oregon public school superintendents were recently appointed to the advisory committee for the University administrative certification program.

The statewide program is a part of the educational policy and management division of the University college of education.

The newly formed advisory committee will help strengthen the certification program by assisting in planning courses and providing a connection between the program and Oregon public schools, according to Richard Carlson, an education professor and director of the division's graduate studies.

Advisory committee appointees are Murl Anderson, Roseburg, Douglas County School District 4; Boyd Applegarth, Beaverton School District 48J; Donald Charles, Lake Oswego School District 7J; and Ken Stanhope, Pendleton, Umatilla Education Service District.

Approximately 900 educators take part in the certification program throughout the state. A basic certificate for teachers, counselors and supervisors wishing to enter administration is one of two types of certification available. A standard certificate is offered for school administrators who already possess the basic certificate.

Programs cut dropout rate

Orientation and counseling help freshmen cope

Thirty-three percent of the University's freshman class drop out each year, and 46 percent of all University students enrolled never reach their senior year.

Alienation and a kind of culture shock add to the high attrition rate, says Gregg Lobisser, University orientation director.

"If students don't feel they have an identity at the University — if they don't 'fit' — it's difficult for them to become committed to their academic work," Lobisser says.

As orientation director, it's Lobisser's job to lower the attrition level of the University's freshmen class. He begins his retention efforts in July during the Early Orientation and Registration Program, a two-day event where students are given their class schedules, introduced to other students and shown around campus.

The approximately 1,500 students who participate in EORP each summer have a higher retention rate and generally better "sense of belonging," Lobisser says.

"They can begin to visualize themselves living here, so when they arrive (in the fall) there are fewer shocks, fewer unknowns," he says.

"Academic frustration" is a major factor in attrition, says David Hubin, learning resources director. Many students come to the University without proper learning skills and as a result are unable to cope with the rigorous demands of higher education, he says.

The Learning Resources Center, a division of the arts and sciences college, offers courses that help freshmen make the transition from high school to college, Hubin says.

One class — Introduction to University Study — covers effective listening and note-taking techniques and the skills necessary to understand reading material.

Financial and personal problems also play a part in a student's decision to leave school, Lobisser says.

"If you've got a $500 bill and you've got a due date coming up and you're not going to meet it, how are you going to focus on academics?" he says.

Short term loans and deferred tuition are two ways the administration helps ease students' concern over finances, Lobisser says, and the counseling center
