

Likens Reagan to Lincoln

BLM chief defends boss

The director of the U.S. Bureau of Land Management spoke at the Lane County Republican Party's annual Lincoln Day Dinner Friday — and was more interested in comparing Pres. Ronald Reagan to Pres. Abraham Lincoln than discussing timber contracts and other environmental issues.

Refusing to answer questions about those topics, Robert Burford issued only one short statement defending policies initiated by him and his boss — Secretary of Interior James Watt.

"Both of us are interested in the environment. Both of us grew up on the ranch and did not come to office to destroy the environment," Burford told republicans.

Burford, a rancher for 30 years and Colorado state legislator for six years before being appointed head of the BLM in May, talked about "federalism," disagreements on the proposed 1983 federal budget, and presidential leadership.

Quoting Lincoln on the rights of the individual, community and state over those of the federal government, Burford said the GOP is moving back towards "respect for" and "emphasis on government" by the lower levels of government.

He said he had spoken to a group of county commissioners earlier in the day, and that they are the basis of the type of government under which "the rest of us strive to achieve things."

Burford, formerly speaker of the Colorado House of Representatives, said that state's legislature avoided many of the economic problems Oregon faces by refusing to institute new taxes five years ago that would have created a tax credit system.

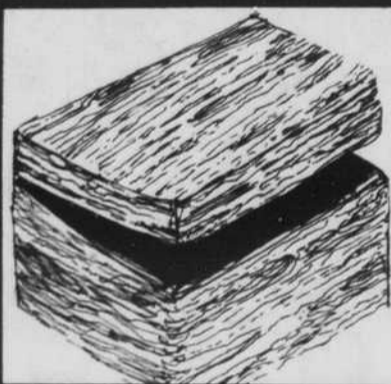

"We will get a budget through. We will come closer to reducing the deficit this time than last time," he said about disagreements among members of Congress on the proposed 1983 federal budget.

One reason Reagan will prevail is because he is consistent in his ideas and statements, Burford said.

"Some of us do believe this may be the one last chance to change the course of government," he said, explaining that many businessmen have made earnings and other sacrifices to join the Reagan administration.

"Let's give them a little chance, a little longer, because it will take a little while to slow inflation down, to balance the budget, to get interest rates back where they belong."
