

also publishes the Free Country Times, a magazine orientated toward the outdoors.

The Outdoor Program, which has been on campus for over 10 years, isn't a club where members must pay dues to join. Rather, Nelson says, "anyone who walks through the doors belongs." Thousands of participants go out on over 400 trips a year. There are a wide variety of trips offered now, ranging from an exotic skin diving adventure in the Caribbean, to a climb of Mount Ranier, to a ski tour through Santiam Pass.

"The trips are extremely informal and spontaneous," Nelson says. "They give anyone the opportunity to get what they want out of the outdoors. It is really unlimited to what you can do and learn from the wilderness.

"After all, the trip to Nepal was just a good idea until someone took the initiative. All it takes is a little interest and you'll find it worth your time."

"This program is exactly what the participants want it to be," Keith Nelson says. "They decide the scope and content by showing where their interests lie."

NFL player, owner talks off to rocky start

HOLLYWOOD, Fla. (AP) — Negotiations between representatives of the National Football League's players and owners got off to a rocky start Tuesday, with both sides sharply criticizing the opposition's opening proposal.

Jack Donlan, executive director of the NFL management council, left the bargaining room less than an hour after the two sides sat down to exchange initial proposals.

Donlan described the union's proposal, which included a demand for a greater percentage of the owners' gross revenues, as a "self-serving, rambling 11-page statement" designed to attract media attention.

"It was not a traditional labor proposal where you address certain problems and express demands," said Donlan.

The two sides met for about two hours Tuesday morning to discuss procedural matters and returned after a lunch break to begin actual negotiations.

Emerging from the afternoon session, Donlan said both sides had agreed to a brief recess to study one another's statements. However, 45 minutes passed with no resumption of talks, and officials later said that talks had been broken off until noon Thursday.

At a news conference, NFL Players Association representatives expressed displeasure that Donlan had shown up for Tuesday's opening round of negotiations with only four other negotiators — no owners and no representative of NFL Commissioner Pete Rozelle.

Gene Upshaw, the union president, also charged that management's 16-page opening proposal lacked substance and called it "an insult to our members."

Donlan said the management proposal sought to make "corrections and adjustments" to the current player contract, which expires July 15.

The NFLPA had earlier said it would seek 55 percent of owners' gross revenues, but owners have claimed that 42 percent already goes to players' salaries.
