

Office aids children

Any professional working with children who needs more factual information on a child's learning potential or behavior may refer the child to the DeBusk Center at the University.

"We have developed a new referral process for doctors, attorneys, counselors and social workers, and will continue to work with parents who wish to bring a youngster in for assessment," says Sue McCullough, who has directed the school psychology program in the College of Education since September.

The center, which provides practicum learning experiences for master's and doctoral degree students in school psychology and in counseling, is located at 1671 Agate St.

McCullough says the University students conduct assessments of various kinds, depending on the needs of the individual child. Included are those for general achievement; intelligence; specific skills such as reading, spelling and math; perceptual-motor skills; adaptive behavior; and personality and behavioral variables.

"Assessments are available for children of all ages," McCullough says. The center typically works with youngsters who are experiencing learning or behavioral problems in school, those who are potentially gifted, are handicapped or developmentally delayed, or those who are entering preschool.

The University students are supervised by University faculty members and certified school psychologists, McCullough says, adding that following an assessment, specific strategies for helping the child are provided.

A fee of $15 is charged to cover cost of materials, but that fee may be waived.

For information or referral forms, contact McCullough at the DeBusk Center, 686-3418. Information is also available from the Division of Counseling and Educational Psychology, 686-5501.

McCullough, who has considerable experience in elementary school and Head Start teaching and in school psychology, received her bachelor's degree in elementary education at Butler University and her master's and doctoral degrees in school psychology at Ball State University.
