IFC candidates join 'gang'

Students for a Progressive Agenda isn't the only group of candidates running on the same platform in the ASUO elections beginning today.

The "Gang of Four" — Incidental Fee Committee candidates Mike Cross, Doug Green, David Ridenour, and Eric Stillwell — say that while they are running on the same platform, they serve no special interest, and if elected, would "work for students, not against the students."

An incidental fee hike would be a "regressive tax," says Green, an economics freshman. Higher fees will cause more students to drop out of the University — demonstrating a principle of "diminishing returns," he says.

"We're aiming our campaign at the majority of the students" who are unaffiliated with special interests, says Cross, a senior in political science and psychology. "Our special interest is just representing the students at large."

Students are going to focus their attention on incidental fees, and they should be kept down, Cross says.

Other parts of their platform include de-regulating fundraising, a five to ten percent cut in ASUO program staff salaries, starting a night student escort service, and legislative involvement by the IFC — "the main fiscal body" of the ASUO.

Members of the Gang of Four also object to Students for a Progressive Agenda, on whose platform six students are running for the IFC. The SPA could be the beginnings of a political machine on campus, Green says.

Ridenour and Green currently serve as chair and vice-chair respectively of the College Republicans. Cross is also head of Young Americans for Freedom.

Two drop out of ASUO race

Ed Colligan, a business junior, withdrew from the ASUO presidential race and announced his alliance with Kevin Kouns and Students for a Progressive Agenda on Tuesday.

Jeffrey Houston, a Russian senior, also withdrew from the race and announced his support of C.J. Balfe, during a Residence Hall Governance Committee forum Monday night.

"Generally we don't have a lot of ideological differences," Colligan said of his support of Kouns, a junior in sociology and womens' studies.

Colligan says Kouns has more experience than he does and that the student body should address international issues such as El Salvador — which Kouns has promised to do.

"C.J. is basically not going to be much different from Rich (Wilkins, current ASUO president)," Colligan said.

"We're happy that Ed has endorsed our organization," said Kouns, adding there are "no barriers" to cooperation between Colligan and the Students for a Progressive Agenda.

Houston spoke at a Monday afternoon ASUO-sponsored forum and made no indication of withdrawing, but said after the RHGC forum that he was "not willing to sacrifice" school time, relationships, and other things important to him if he were elected president.

"C.J. (Balfe) really has a foot in the door and would make a damn good president," he said, adding that his supporters should shift their allegiance to Balfe.

Houston, who said he will be in Israel part of the summer and wouldn't be at the University for that first part of a possible term, emphasized that he plans to participate in student government next year anyway.

Balfe had no comment on Houston's withdrawal and support for him.
