Return of Sinai rekindles hope

CAIRO, Egypt

The return of the Sinai Peninsula has rekindled Egyptian hopes for prosperity, but the initial impact of the Israeli withdrawal has been largely symbolic.

Egyptian officials and the government-controlled news media have focused attention on development plans for the Sinai since last Sunday when the Israelis ended their 15-year occupation. The Cabinet met last week to discuss projects and assured residents of food, water and services.

In a May Day speech, Pres. Hosni Mubarak said Saturday the end of the Israeli occupation generated a giant momentum that should be harnessed toward building the economy. Western economists estimate Egypt's annual inflation at 30 percent.

The most immediate return from the Sinai is expected to be in tourism, using hotels and other facilities built by the Israelis. Tourism is a pillar of the Egyptian economy already, bringing in $1.1 billion last year.

The Egyptian planners also hope to continue and expand land-reclamation projects begun by the Israelis to increase food production and provide new homes for people living in the overcrowded Nile Valley.

screamed abuse at the Communist government.

The warning came on the eve of a new rally planned by underground leaders of the suspended independent Solidarity union and pleas for calm from Poland's influential Roman Catholic Church, which apparently feared the state would retaliate against more protests.

"Recommending the proclamation of these relaxations, the Martial Law Council of National Redemption simultaneously ordered state organs to firmly counteract the violation of existing martial law regulations," said an Interior Ministry communique broadcast on nationwide television.

The communique said all marches, rallies, lectures and speeches must still be officially sanctioned, and violators would face jail under summary procedures with no appeal.

But in a sign that authorities wanted to impress Poles they were easing martial law, television news announcers doffed their military garb and appeared in civilian clothes for the first time since the crackdown.
