British claim nine Argentine aircraft

BUENOS AIRES
Britain claimed its forces shot down six Argentine fighter-bombers in a furious air-sea battle Sunday as the Argentines attacked Royal Navy warships near the British beachhead on the Falkland Islands. It said three other Argentine jets probably were downed and one British frigate was hit in the air raid.

Argentina's Joint Chiefs of Staff announced its warplanes attacked the San Carlos landing zone and said no details would be released until the results were evaluated.

The official Telam news agency quoted military sources as saying Argentine ground forces had launched "a big offensive" to dislodge the British who landed Friday on East Falkland, one of the two major islands in the South Atlantic archipelago.

Telam claimed Argentine jets seriously damaged two British frigates and an unidentified British transport ship that was unloading supplies at San Carlos.

Britain acknowledged one frigate was damaged. It said there were several fires on the warship, which was not named, "and attempts are being made to bring them under control." No casualty report was given.

The Argentine military command gave no further information in its communique and said results of the raids were being evaluated.

There was no word from officials here on the British claim that at least six Argentine warplanes were shot down during the air raid against the Royal Navy fleet and three helicopters were hit in another battle earlier Sunday.

The Defense Ministry reported that British Harrier jets attacked three Argentine helicopters Sunday over Falkland Sound, which separates the two main islands of East Falkland and West Falkland in the South Atlantic archipelago. It said one Puma helicopter was seen to explode, a Bell helicopter was in flames and a second Puma may have been damaged.

Telam quoted its unidentified military sources as saying the British were cut off from their supplies "and will have to surrender at any moment for lack of munitions, food and (adequate) clothing" to face the bitter winter.

Buenos Aires newspapers said the British troops were outnumbered, outgunned and pinned down.

"The British are surrounded," one military source told The Associated Press. "They have no air or naval support and have their backs to the sea. Now we will start to push them harder."

In a communique issued before dawn Sunday, the Joint Chiefs of Staff said Argentine forces were acting to prevent the British from consolidating their beachhead.

The Argentine military source described the British Defense ministry's claim that 5,000 British troops were on the islands as "fantasy." He said 800 was a generous estimate.

Between 9,000 and 10,000 Argentine troops are believed to be on the British colony Argentina seized seven weeks ago.

Telam said the situation around San Carlos "is under the control of our forces." The privately owned news agency DYN quoted military sources as saying pockets of British resistance at San Carlos were being mopped up by Argentine troops.

A communique from the Joint Chiefs of Staff broadcast by Buenos Aires radio said information on ground activity in the islands would not be as quickly available as that of air or naval action.
