Argentines launch
'mass air attack'

FALKLAND ISLANDS

Argentine warplanes Tuesday launched a "mass air attack" on the British fleet supporting the Falkland Islands invasion force and one vessel was hit and "is in difficulty," the British Defense Ministry reported.

A British news agency said more than two ships were hit and the badly damaged vessel was believed to be a destroyer. Argentina claimed its pilots struck three British frigates and also "probably damaged" a medium-sized transport vessel. The Defense Ministry in London claimed Britain's carrier-based Harrier jets shot down three Argentine Skyhawks during furious dogfights over the war fleet that came as Argentines celebrated their independence from Spain 172 years ago.

Late communiques from Argentina's Joint Chiefs of Staff said that one of the British frigates was severely damaged and billowing smoke.

The Chiefs of Staff claimed Argentine anti-aircraft gunners shot down three Harriers attacking Stanley, the capital of the Falklands, and acknowledged the loss of one Argentine plane. The British said none of their aircraft was downed.

Press Association, Britain's domestic news agency, noted that British Defense Secretary John Nott had spoken of only one ship being hit, but it said without giving attribution that "more than two warships" were struck by missiles or bombs and the one reported badly damaged was believed to be a "Type 42 destroyer" with a crew of 280.

Nott, in his report, did not name the crippled vessel and said no information was available on casualties. He said the ship was in the fleet supporting the British beachhead at San Carlos Bay, 50 miles west of Stanley.

A British Defense Ministry spokesman said "rescue operations are in progress." He said the stricken craft was not one of the task force's two aircraft carriers, the Hermes and Invincible.

British correspondents aboard ships in the task force compared the Argentine air raids to Japanese suicide attacks against American warships toward the end of World War II. Nott said the "Argentine pilots are showing great bravery. It would be foolish of me to say anything else."

Britain claimed it shot down eight Argentine planes Monday, bringing to 64 the number of Argentine aircraft claimed destroyed. But Britain lost its third major warship, the frigate Antelope, which was blown up by an Argentine bomb that landed in its engine room.

At the United Nations, Argentine Foreign Minister Nicanor Costa Mendez told the Security Council his government was prepared to consider a cease-fire, but British Ambassador Sir Anthony Parsons said any call for a truce was totally unacceptable as long as Argentine troops remained.

Ambassadors from several non-aligned nations drafting a compromise resolution indicated Britain and Argentina were close to agreement on the proposal, which would give the U.N. secretary-general seven days to arrange a cease-fire.
