

Senator accused of ethics infractions, hearing set

SALEM (AP) — The Oregon Government Ethics Commission is expected to rule Friday on a motion to dismiss one of two complaints filed against state Sen. Keith Burbidge, D-Salem.

The commission on Wednesday began a hearing into a complaint filed against Burbidge. The complaint alleged he violated Oregon ethics laws by failing to disclose a conflict of interest in a bill he sponsored which specifically benefited his wife, Nita Burbidge, a state employee. It also alleged Burbidge improperly used his office for his own personal gain.

Burbidge's attorney also moved to dismiss one of the complaints on Wednesday. The commission adjourned without making a ruling. It is scheduled to reconvene Friday at 7 a.m.

During the day-long hearing, the commission heard testimony about Burbidge's sponsorship of a bill increasing his wife's state retirement benefits.

The first complaint alleges Burbidge failed to disclose a conflict of interest when he voted on the retirement bill. The second alleges that his sponsorship of the measure constituted an illegal use of his office for personal gain.

Michael Dye, a Salem attorney representing Burbidge, moved to dismiss the second complaint. He said the law was meant to prohibit lawmakers from selling their vote or influence, but did not prohibit them from sponsoring any legislation from which they or their family members would benefit.

Dye said the senator acknowledges making no formal declaration of a conflict of interest when the bill was before the Senate. However, he claimed it was general knowledge that Nita Burbidge, an employee of Adult and Family Services, was the only person expected to benefit under an amendment put into the bill by her husband. That general knowledge exempted Burbidge from the requirement, Dye claimed.

Peter Herman, who served as prosecutor in the hearing, said the requirement for disclosure wasn't just for the senators' benefit, but for the benefit of the public.

Cocaine sting nets job-less 'dealers'

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — A narcotics sting operation aimed at unemployed workers seeking jobs has fallen apart with the prosecution's decision to drop charges against 29 people snared in the operation run by a free-lance narcotics agent.

Drug charges against 19 people in Napa County were dropped on Wednesday and charges against 10 others in San Francisco were dropped on Tuesday.

"Entrapment would be a viable defense in each case" in Napa County said District Attorney James Boitano.

The sting was run by free-lance narcotics agent Marc Caven, 28, of Gresham, Ore., who has run a series of similar operations in Oregon and Washington. Cases against defendants in several of those incidents have been thrown out by judges on grounds of entrapment.

Caven advertised construction jobs for the mythical Evergreen Construction & Landscaping during February and March. Defendants in earlier cases said that when they appeared for interviews, Caven said he would get them a job or give them priority on a waiting list if they would bring him cocaine.

An undercover police officer would buy the drugs and arrest the job applicants when they showed up at Caven's motel room. Job seekers brought bindles and baggies of cocaine in amounts ranging from a half-gram to 1½ ounces. "We spent in the neighborhood of $1,100 and got $33,000 worth of drugs off the streets," said San Francisco Police Sgt. Rene La-Prevotte, who supervised the narcotic detail's sting operation.

San Francisco Assistant District Attorney Robert Gordon said he was convinced that no entrapment occurred in the cases here, but he said it would be difficult to prove that in court.

Religious affiliates join forces in nuclear protests

SEATTLE (AP) — With a boost from the religious community, demonstrators who have waged a generally peaceful, 7½-year battle against the nuclear weapons-bearing Trident submarine are preparing for another summer of protests.

A vigil is scheduled this Sunday in four states, but the highlight of the protest season will be this summer's arrival of the first Trident submarine — the Ohio — at the Trident base in Washington state.

It is a moment the Trident protesters have hoped and prayed wouldn't arrive.

But they won't quietly accept the nuclear sub's arrival, and have new support among religious leaders this year, sparked by Seattle Catholic Archbishop Raymond Hunthausen's well-publicized castigation of the Trident missile system a year ago.

"There have been big changes in the 7½ years of the Trident campaign," Jim Douglass, organizer for the Ground Zero protest group, acknowledged Tuesday night in an interview.

"When we first began working on the project, Trident was a sugarless gum and not much else," he said, referring to the lack of knowledge about the weapon.

"Now there are questions being raised in the community as well as a wide-based peace movement."

On Sunday, the Agape Community, a Christian group formed to protest Trident, is sponsoring vigils in 13 communities on a railroad line between Salt Lake City and the Navy's Trident base at Bangor, on Hood Canal west of Seattle.

Rocket motors for the Trident's missiles are shipped along the railroad, from where they are built near Salt Lake City.

Renee Krisko, a member of the Agape Community, said it was difficult to estimate how many might show up at the different locations, but said Portland organizers were planning for as many as 500. She said 50 to 200 were expected at Bangor.

The Ohio, now at the Electric Boat yard in Groton, Conn., after sea trials, is expected to arrive sometime this summer at the Navy base at Bangor. Protesters, including many religious leaders, have said they will meet the sub with their own boats. Some will "wit-ness" the arrival, while others plan to try to blockade the submarine near the entrance of Hood Canal.

"Our intention is to resist Trident, so we hope to have some boats resisting its entrance," said Krisko, a Catholic nun.

On Aug. 8, a rally is planned north of Bangor, at Point Julia on property owned by the Klallam Indian tribe. "Resist Trident, Celebrate Hope," is the theme, said Shelley Douglass, Jim Douglass' wife. Hunthausen and Methodist Bishop Melvin Talbert, also of Seattle, are among the scheduled speakers.

Shelley Douglass said support from respected church figures has helped give the anti-Trident movement credibility, and has raised questions even among those depending on the submarine and weapon system for their livelihoods.

"People on the Trident base have done a lot of agonizing over that," she said.

Past anti-Trident protests continued year-round, but the more public exercises have been from late spring to early fall.

Prayer vigils have been held in front of the Navy's Trident base at Bangor every Sunday for the past three months, and demonstrators have handed out leaflets at the entrance gate every week for years.

This Sunday's Agape Community appeal to scrap Trident is more public, with members conducting prayer vigils along the railroad tracks in four states.

The communities involved are Bangor, Elma, Centralia, Castle Rock, Kelso-Longview, Vancouver and Washougal, Wash.; Portland, The Dalles, La-Grande and Baker, Ore.; Shoshone, Idaho; and Salt Lake City.

Agape Community, said Krisko, named itself for a term used by early Christian communities to refer to love and fellowship among members of the communities.

She said vigils would also be held in the communities July 4, Independence Day, and Aug. 6, the 37th anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima.

Workshops have already begun in preparation of the Trident submarine's arrival at Bangor. Ms. Douglass said people considering taking part in the blockade of Trident were being asked to give considerable thoughts to their actions, and the possibility of jail terms and fines.

She said they also should learn some boating skills. "There will be an attempt at a blockade, to keep the boat from coming in, at least for a few minutes," she said. But then, she added, it could be officials will keep protest boats well away from the Ohio.
