The Hatfield strategy thus avoids the Constitutional amendment route to denying women a right to abortion. Getting such an amendment ratified by the Senate and the necessary number of states would take a long time and is by no means certain of succeeding.

Yet, the bill doesn't go so far as to strip state courts and all lower Federal courts of the opportunity to make judgments, as the Helms bill does.

"We're not being tricky, the Senator has always been upfront," Serratt says.

"And remember, by going to the Supreme Court, we are taking the risk that they could affirm Roe v. Wade, too."

venience.' People are not convenient. I don't think caring for people is a convenient thing, even if you want to." She mentions their four children. "We're madly in love with them — and they're very inconvenient."

"Rarely is someone interested in the quality of life of the baby," Pam added. "It's often the quality of life of the mother... The quality of my life."

But a woman faced with an unwanted pregnancy needs more than pro-life pamphlets, Charles says. "We can't simply say, don't do what you're doing and offer no alternative to the people who are hurting."

If a woman decides to go through with her pregnancy, she may need friends and money, he says, adding that his family once had a young woman live with them during her pregnancy. He also arranges adoptions for mothers unable to keep their babies. "I have a much, much longer waiting list of people looking for babies than I have available children."

Many doctors seem to expect a woman to have an abortion, Charles says. "For instance, when Pam was first pregnant I was in medical school at the time, and we were dealing with one of the clinics in San Francisco that does a lot of abortions. When she was told her pregnancy test was positive, the response was, 'Well, what do you want to do about it?'"

Pam adds, "I said, 'What do you mean? I don't understand the question.' And they said, 'Would you want to terminate or continue?' I think that was pretty crass."

But does the pro-life movement have the right to legislate its morality?

"The equivalent of the Supreme Court in West Germany ruled against abortion-on-demand because of the impact that that would have on society in terms of de-valuing human beings," Charles says. The court compared the abortion issue to Nazi Germany's definition of Jews as sub-human and not worthy of life, he adds. "We've been through that, and the answer is, no, it's not acceptable."

"Views of some kind are inflicted upon society, anyway. So the question is, are there certain situations where we make laws and certain situations where we don't make laws? Most people have no problem with a law that says it is not OK to murder. Now, those people are inflicting that view on the people who want to commit murder."

"If, in fact, the fetus is human and the fetus is living, then it is just as reasonable to say it is not OK to kill that fetus as it is to say it's not OK to kill you, or me, or anybody else."
