

Wingard relies on record, not party

By David Steinmetz

Republican Sen. George Wingard's voting record has earned an 85 percent approval rating from the Lane County Democratic Party.

While his new opponent in the November election, first-term Democratic Rep. Margie Hendriksen, earned a 100 percent rating from her party.

Wingard hopes to meet Hendriksen's challenge by pointing out their differences on issues rather than in party affiliation to the voters in his Democrat-dominated district.

"I'm not a knee-jerk party person. I've gotten a lot of support from both Democrats and Republicans over the years," he says. "Democrats generally support me when they find out what I've done."

The record he wants to emphasize includes writing or chief sponsorship of "the most progressive energy conservation building code in the nation," the "strongest permit system for air and water pollution in the nation," and a thermonuclear siting bill instituting a "long and arduous" siting process.

He was similarly instrumental in tax form and bureaucratic simplification bills, and co-sponsored the bill granting bike path construction.

His low-key style made him decide to spend time with Gov. Vic Atiyeh, telling him "higher education is the best business we've got," rather than with the Legislature's budget-writing Ways and Means Committee, he says.

Hendriksen's entry into the race changes Wingard's campaign financing strategy. "I haven't done any extensive financing to this point," he noted, "but I'll need to now."

He had anticipated less extensive campaigning and fund-raising until Hendriksen recently announced her intent to fill the vacancy left by journalist Gerry Mackie's resignation as the Democratic nominee.

Hendriksen, a "very aggressive campaigner," replaced a candidate who had no name familiarity with voters, Wingard says.

A recent poll shows Hendriksen may be able to win the upcoming general election, but Wingard suggests this is because he hasn't been talking about what he's accomplished in the senate.

"I like to talk about what we'll do next," he says.

Wingard says he wants to continue working on present and future problems affecting his district and the state, with emphasis on environment, energy and transportation.

His answer to the state's present recession and budget problems would include in-state investment of Oregon pension funds, and a close examination of the costly 1979 property tax relief program.
