Ducks lose unhappy Hill

From Emerald and Associated Press reports

Dana Hill, the Oregon quarterback of the future, has become a quarterback of the past.

On Tuesday, Oregon coach Rich Brooks announced that Hill had missed Monday's practice and moved out of his dormitory room.

Hill, who was suspended for last weekend's game at Washington after missing a team meeting, had expressed displeasure in the past week with his situation at Oregon.

According to offensive coordinator Erik Widmark, Hill said last week that he was uncomfortable with the overall Oregon program.

"He was uncomfortable with the school, the program, the community," Widmark said. "He was just uncomfortable with the whole situation."

"For his own reasons, he felt Oregon was not the place for him to be," said Brooks.

"It's extremely difficult for any freshman to be thrust to the forefront in major college football. I'm sure the pressure of playing and the start of classes and the required attendance at those functions can be very difficult for a young man.

"We have talked with his mother (in Pomona, Calif.) and to his high school coach and the assumption is that he is somewhere between here and Los Angeles," Brooks said.

Hill can still rejoin the team if he wants to, Brooks said.

Widmark said that the disappearance of Hill came as "a little bit of a surprise," but not a big shock. Widmark said he doesn't think the freshman's decision to leave was a direct result of the suspension. "It was just the overall program," Hill's statistics were not overly impressive,

8-24 for 67 yards, but at times he seemed to provide the leadership the Ducks needed.

The freshman's departure adds more intrigue to the soap opera story of Oregon quarterbacks this season. Oregon has had three different starting quarterbacks in four games and Hill was the only two-time starter.

Widmark would not speculate on who might start game number five, next Saturday in Los Angeles against USC. "I don't think anything is safe to say at this point," he said.

Deer season set Saturday

From Associated Press

Thousands of Oregonians will grab their rifles and head for the state's woods and rangeland this weekend for the start of the deer hunting season.

The Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife said the hunters' success will vary widely around the state.

East of the Cascades, hunting for mule deer is expected to be poor to fair because of the large number of animals killed by the extreme cold last winter.

As a result, several hunting units will have a shortened, one-week season that begins Saturday and ends Oct. 8.

The season in all other Eastern Oregon units will begin Saturday and run to Oct. 10.

In Western Oregon, hunters are expected to have good success in their quest for black-tailed deer. The cool, wet weather could create the best season-opening conditions in several years.

The black-tailed deer season, which also starts Saturday, will continue through Nov. 2.

Deer tags must be purchased by Friday night. Hunters of black-tailed deer must shoot bucks with at least forked horns. Hunters of mule deer can shoot bucks with spiked horns or better, with a few exceptions.

The season for chukar and Hungarian partridge also starts Saturday, with the Fish and Wildlife Department predicting that hunters will find far fewer birds this season.
