Flag-burners' convictions stand but Justice calls it censorship

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court, warned by its senior member that it was sanctioning political "censorship pure and simple," left intact on Monday two Communists' convictions for burning a U.S. flag.

By an 8-1 vote, the high court refused to hear arguments that the convictions violated free-speech rights.

"I am confident," Justice William Brennan wrote in his lone dissent, "the court after argument would reverse these convictions and uphold the vital constitutional principle forbidding government censorship of unpopular political views."

Teresa Kime and Donald Bonwell were convicted and sentenced to eight months in jail for burning a flag, owned by Kime, during a demonstration in Greensboro, N.C., two years ago.

The two were prosecuted under a federal law imposing penalties on anyone who "knowingly casts contempt upon any flag of the United States by publicly mutilating, defacing, defiling, burning or trampling upon it."

Kime and Bonwell, avowed members of the Revolutionary Communist Party, never denied having burned the flag. Instead, they argued that the burning was a form of political protest protected by the Constitution.

In a separate case, the court agreed to decide whether the government ever can be ordered to pay legal fees incurred by people who unsuccessfully sue over alleged non-enforcement of a major clean-air law.

A lower court said the government could be forced to pay. The justices will be studying Environmental Protection Agency arguments aimed at avoiding payment of some $90,000 to lawyers for the Sierra Club and the Environmental Defense Fund.

The EPA was ordered to pay the fees, even though the two environmental groups lost a lawsuit seeking to force the agency to tighten pollution controls on coal-fired power plants.

Chicago police use magic in hunt for Tylenol killer

CHICAGO (AP) — The magic pen scrawled a tidbit of information.

The shaking right hand wrote three names.

Amateur detectives sniffed out a couple of leads.

Stockbrokers passed on their theories.

The police took them all seriously — the pen, the hand, the mystery buffs and the portfolio men — because investigators trying to find the Tylenol killer are desperate, and the stakes are high.

"So many people can be harmed in such an easy manner," said Sgt. Leonard Muscolino, a Chicago police officer investigating the deaths last month of seven people who took Extra-Strength Tylenol capsules laced with cyanide. "It scares you. You just have to get to a guy like this."

The random nature of the killings makes the case hard to solve, he said. While there's always the hope for a nugget, many of the tips have been fool's gold or worse — murky offerings from dreams or trances.

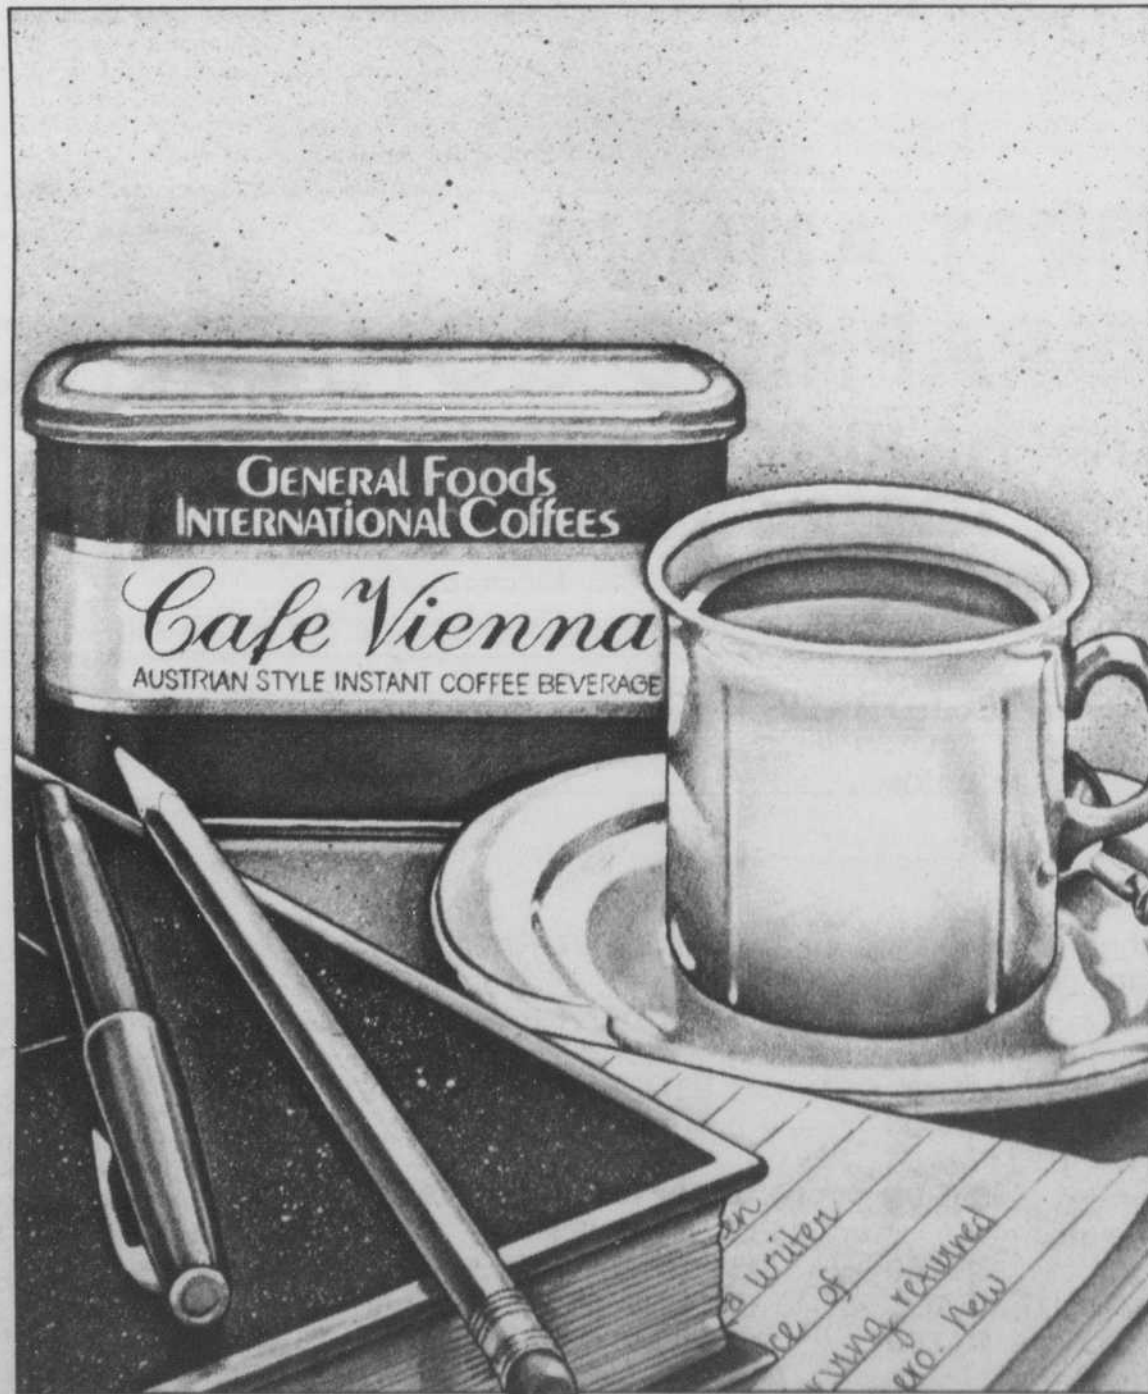

Investigators work on scores of tips each day from a public eager to help solve the murders.

From London to the Los Angeles area, from psychics to psychologists, the calls and letters come in to more than 130 investigators working around-the-clock.

"They all mean well," Muscolino said. "All of them attempt to give us their theories."

Stockbrokers play sleuth, suggesting manipulation of the stockmarket. Doctors offer profiles of the killer. Mystery buffs note that clues may be sitting on library shelves — particularly books with poison plots.
