Dress him up and take him out to Mel Torme

Kim's making a little progress. He's chosen a Calvin Klein 100 percent buttondown shirt in a subtle shade of mauve. It has a thin turquoise stripe and looks pretty good with his narrow, salmon suede tie. He's still got the jeans on.

Now he's found the quintessential herringbone jacket. It's a muted blue and rust plaid, and is almost all wool. Do something about those shoes. Track treads will never make it.

Kim's getting braver by the minute. This time, he could be out on a limb with a very expensive pair of leather pants pressed with snakeskin. They're lined in rayon. Guess the jacket got a little hot with all that skin.

He may be straightening up that New Wavish, L.A.ish image when he adds this 100 percent wool rust pullover. It's designed by Cacharel and has a little V-neckline. Notice he's changed his shoes.

He did get a little warm, and he's having third or fourth thoughts about what to wear. Now he's thinking chic but casual, and, oh my, the collar's going up on a black Calvin Klein t-shirt.

Now what? Punk? Street fighter? Mod Bruce Lee? Kim dug up this reversible leather vest to wear with a pair of black leather pants. A sponge has to be used to remove the dust from them. Is that a cummerbund?

He took the grey and white striped cummerbund off. New Wave deserves one last chance. Black, but not exactly black tie. Looks like he might be coming up with an idea, or maybe she's coming up with one.

This is it, folks. He's going to see Mel after all, respectfully dressed in a white cotton wingtip collar shirt, black wool pants with reverse front pleats, a silk bow tie, and the cummerbund. Dressed up, to the hit.

It's hard to give them up. Faded blue jeans (even though model Kim Chin could black-market these in the USSR) and frayed oxford shirts won't cut it for a big night on the town.
