Davis announces 'in-state' recruiting plan

Oregon's higher education Chancellor Bud Davis announced a "game plan" Friday to attract Oregon's outstanding high school students to in-state institutions.

"I want to go after students like a football team would go after a 6'4" quarterback with a 4.0 grade point average who can throw with either hand," Davis said. "The key to this is aggressive recruiting."

Davis outlined his "campaign for excellence" at the State Board of Higher Education's meeting on the Oregon State University campus Friday. Davis said he is concerned about the number of outstanding students who opt for out-of-state schools.

Asking for nearly 200 "Presidential Scholarships" of $1,000 each, Davis outlined a five-point plan — with the scholarships as the "keystone" — that includes more strict admissions standards, improved teacher training, stronger general education programs and a revitalized high school and community college relations program.

"If our best high school graduates go to California for their post-secondary educations, they are likely to remain (in California)," Davis said.

"To stop this 'brain drain' and ultimately bring new vitality to the state, we must both provide incentives for students to stay here and then give them the high quality programs they deserve," he said.

"We'll raise the money from private subscriptions. It will not be awarded on a need basis but by ability and performance," Davis said. "We will recognize talent and reward it where it is."

Davis said all institution presidents received the scholarship plan warmly when he spoke with them. The plan calls for each of the three state universities to provide 50 scholarships the first year and each of the regional colleges, along with the Oregon Institute of Technology, to provide 10 scholarships. Funds will come from private donations and may, if the donor wishes, bear his or her name.

"Hopefully the numbers will grow as more of the public comes to see the value of the program," Davis said. "We are asking private citizens and businesses to invest in Oregon's best and brightest students. These will be investments in the future, which can pay incalculable dividends for the state of Oregon."

In other business, the board adopted a policy and a code of conduct for intercollegiate athletics.

The policy contains a general statement about the purpose and intent of intercollegiate athletics at system institutions as well as a "code of ethics" which establishes guidelines for conduct of student-athletes and coaches.

"All we've done is update previous policy so that it reflects a change in funding," said Richard Perry, director of management and planning for the state system.

"This policy represents a major step that will enable the presidents and athletic directors to operate with considerable control, yet I don't think in any way will it stifle coaches," Perry said.

One change was proposed for the policy. Ed Harms, a Springfield lawyer and past board president, suggested adding a paragraph to the code of ethics that stressed the importance of earning a degree while competing in intercollegiate athletics.

Salazar kicks past Gomez to take marathon

NEW YORK (AP) — Alberto Salazar conserved his energy and powered past Mexico's Rodolfo Gomez in the stretch Sunday, winning the New York City Marathon for the third consecutive year.

With a dramatic finish, Salazar completed the 26-mile, 385-yard trek in 2 hours, 9 minutes, 29 seconds.

"I was saving it (energy) for my last surge," said the confident Salazar, who is unbeaten in four marathons, including last April's Boston Marathon.

The 24-year-old Cuban native, who now lives and trains in Eugene, needed every ounce of energy to outlast the dogged Gomez, 31, undefeated in three previous marathons this year.

The 1-2 finish by Salazar and Gomez matched their positions in the 1980 New York City Marathon. But two years ago, Salazar won handily. This time, Gomez gave him a fight to the finish.

Starting near the 21-mile mark of the run through the city's five boroughs, the two ran side-by-side, never more than a step or two apart until they headed for the finish line in Central Park.

Then, the bigger, stronger Salazar made his winning surge through a cloud of dirt, finally putting away the gritty Gomez, who was clocked in a personal best of 2:09:33.

After the two crossed the finish line, they embraced warmly, knowing they had produced a scintillating "Duel in the Sun," before a huge national television audience and a crowd estimated at three million spectators along the route.

Another embrace at the finish line took place between Grete Waitz and her husband Jack, after the 29-year-old Norwegian won the women's race for the fourth time in five years. Finishing a marathon for the first time since winning the New York City event for the third straight time in 1980, she was timed in 2:27:14.

Both winners were short of the world-bests, set in this race last year — 2:08:13 by Salazar and 2:25:29 by New Zealander Allison Roe, who was unable to defend her title this year because of an Achilles tendon injury.

The men's race was expected to be reminiscent of the Boston Marathon, where Salazar outkicked Dick Beardsley by two seconds. But Beardsley suffered a leg cramp at about the nine-mile mark and finished 30th.

"I'm sorry I didn't give Al a better race," Beardsley said. "I felt very prepared and confident, but I just didn't have it today."

Instead, it was Gomez who fought it out with the favored Salazar.
