

University student raped while jogging bike path

A 20-year-old University student was beaten and raped Friday while jogging on the bike path north of the Willamette River.

According to Sgt. Rick Allison of the Eugene Police Department, the woman was jogging alone at 11:30 a.m. when she was accosted about a quarter mile from the Knickerbocker bicycle bridge, toward the Springfield city limits.

The woman stated that she was struck in the head with an umbrella and dragged about 15 feet toward the river before being raped. One or two people may have passed on the path during the incident, but Allison says they neither prevented nor reported the rape.

Campus security transported the woman from the Student Health Center, where she went directly after the assault, to Sacred Heart Hospital.

The suspect was described by his victim as a 5-foot-10-inch white male, with medium-length blond hair, a short beard and a mustache. He was wearing a blue Levis jacket, blue jeans and brown hiking boots.

A Volkswagen van, linked to the assailant because it was seen in the vicinity before the rape and not afterward, was described as white, a 1976 or 1977 model, with many dents and rust spots visible.

Allison requested that anyone in the area at the time contact him at Campus Security.

200 people turn out for chance to patrol Portland as 'Angels'

PORTLAND, (AP) — More than 200 people have applied for the chance to patrol Portland's streets wearing the distinctive red berets of the Guardian Angels.

The applicants, Portland's first group of prospective Guardian Angels, signed up during an eight-day recruiting session that ended at 8 p.m. Saturday, a Guardian Angels spokesman said.

"Of that 200, we accepted about 90 percent into the initial training program," said Michael

Stoops, founder of the Portland chapter of the group and director of the Burnside Community Council.

About 10 percent of the applicants were rejected for reasons including past criminal convictions and unacceptable attitudes about the group's purpose, Stoops said.

People who want "to go out and play cop," or who see the group as the first step toward a law enforcement career were rejected, he said.

ORT suspends operations

The Oregon Repertory Theater, the only professional theater company in Eugene, has suspended operations to concentrate on fundraising efforts.

In its announcement over the weekend, ORT said the decision was an effort to "gear up to move into the Hult Center."

The company is planning a "reorganization program," in which ORT would join the other major local companies in the new performing arts center.

The company, which has been losing money steadily since its 1981 move into the old Eugene Hotel, is suspending artistic production to prevent further losses. Current estimates of ORT's debt run as high as $200,000.

Under the reorganization scheme, ORT plans to sell off its assets, including seats and lighting equipment, and to open an office in the Arts Management Services building, which also houses the symphony, opera and ballet.

When the 10-year-old company moved from The Atrium in 1981, it had enough funds to continue operation. However, the cost to remodel its current theater eliminated any chance of moving into the new Hult Center when it opened.

New fundraising efforts have been introduced to save the company. ORT expects to resume production in October, 1983, if fundraising is successful. Company spokesmen cautioned, however, that if fundraising is unsuccessful the theater will fold.
