Video games stabilize discretionary services

By Tony Hazarian
Of the Emerald

The recreation center continues to have financial problems due to its "discretionary" services, said Bob Schutz, EMU assistant director and business manager at the EMU Board budget committee meeting Thursday.

Without the money from video games, "the recreation center would not exist," Schutz said. Whether students decide to bowl or play pool, he said, the cost of the services still exists.

Mary Hotchkiss, budget committee chairer, asked Schutz if the video games corresponded with the union's policy of budgeting programs with academic merit.

"Most (college) unions have it and they make good money from it," Schutz said. The machines turned a profit of $58,216 in 1980-81, he said.

Despite the unprofitability of the recreation center and the main desk, the budget committee continues to find them worthy services, Schutz said.

In other financial matters, Schutz said the University is contemplating contracting out custodial services, probably to save money. No decision has been made, but it is uncertain whether the EMU will have a say in the contract signing, Schutz said.

"We're not convinced there is a savings of money, but it's safe to assume there is," he said about the service for the EMU.

Should a contract be signed, the custodians would only do the contracted work, resulting in a lack of "flexibility," Schutz said.

"The physical plant director would be in charge of the contract, but the EMU would have plenty to say" over its applicability to the union, he said.

"At the moment, we're not in favor of it," Schutz said.

Board member Jeff Nudelman voiced concern about the increase of print shops in the University vicinity. He proposed renting the EMU print shop to another type of business. But Schutz said the print shop will break even this year, and the future looks bright as the shop's machines are paid off.

"In two years, we know we'll be saving $1,000," in operation costs, Schultz said.

Schutz, EMU business manager for the past eight years, won't be around to see if the shop prospers, as he's been hired as the business manager of the Hult Center for the Performing Arts. Schutz will begin working at the Hult Center on Dec. 1.

The EMU hopes the position can be filled by the day Schutz leaves, but "it might take a little longer than that," said EMU director Adell McMillan. The EMU has to wait for a certified list of applicants from the management service department before a selection committee can screen the candidates, she said.

In other board news, three board positions are open to applications, said John Dulcich, EMU Board chairer.
