It was like a flashback to 1960s activism when nearly 100 demonstrators staged a one-night 'sit-in' inside an entryway at the Honeywell Corporation headquarters in south Minneapolis, Minn. The demonstrators were protesting Honeywell's production of weapons.

The demonstrators, wearing green armbands, waited out the night preparing for arrests in the morning. The group planned to blockade all the doors, possibly with chains.

The group, calling itself The Honeywell Project, is demanding that the corporation shift its operations to non-military projects and pay $1 million to Lebanese cluster bomb victims.

"The point is to disrupt the daily routine of Honeywell business, which is responsible for death and murder," said a group spokesman.

There aren't any easier ways to get a firm $20 into your hairy hands in Athens, Georgia. A sperm bank that opened next door to the University of Georgia campus was flooded with so many donors on its first day that they stopped taking applicants for two weeks.

The owner of the sperm bank says it's the easy money that attracts the students. It may be the $20 or that donors can make deposits every two days.

The bank ships the sperm as far as Alaska, where it's used for artificial insemination.

The Daily Lobo editorial case seems to have been laid to rest — with more than one casualty.

The editorial on the disparity of SAT scores among racial and ethnic groups ignited what has been called a "lynch mob." The "mob" had no time to stop and consider that in an editorial — a signed editorial — the author "has the right to say, write, print or authorize publication of any material which the editor chooses, subject only to the lawful restrictions of the First Amendment." That's from a memorandum to the University of New Mexico's publications board.

However, it's too late for the suspended, then reinstated editor Marcy McKinley. The pressure the "lynch mob" of irate students put on her was too much. McKinley resigned as editor Oct. 28.

Perhaps it's epidemic. Two staff writers at Francis Marion College's Campus Crier have resigned and the publication temporarily suspended in the wake of public outcry over a parody edition which critics say contained racial slurs.

"It got into a few racial matters that many students objected to," said J. Robert Ward, director of information services at Francis Marion. "Many students objected because it was kind of vile," he added.

Ward said publication of the newspaper would resume once less vile writers were found.

A civil complaint has been lodged against the University of California Regents and just about anybody in sight by a Santa Barbara "street person."

The "street person," Charles Schindler, filed a civil complaint charging Isla Vista foot patrol Officer Emmet Darbyshire and Robert Silva, a UCSB police officer with false arrest and imprisonment, battery, negligence, violation of civil rights and intentional infliction of emotional distress. Also named in the suit are the regents, the County of Santa Barbara and Sheriff John Carpenter.

Schindler says that the two officers approached him and threw him to the ground then "maced and battered" him.

The suit also charges the violation of Schindler's First, Fourth, Eighth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendment rights.

An unnamed George Washington University student was evicted after drugs were found in his room. The drugs were confiscated by campus security.

The director of housing said that several students had attempted to purchase drugs from the student, "who was not available at the time." Apparently, when the purchasers couldn't find the alleged dealer in Thurston dormitory they became "loud and persistent about finding the student."

The director would not say what drugs were involved, nor what disciplinary action would be taken. A source, though, said the incident involved cocaine.
