Oregon drug overdoses rise, many from cocaine injections

PORTLAND (AP) — More Oregonians are dying from overdoses of antidepressant prescription drugs and direct injections of cocaine, while deaths from other drugs — legal or otherwise — are declining, a deputy state medical examiner says.

"The last three or four years there has been quite a striking increase from overdoses," Dr. Larry Lewman says about tricyclic antidepressants.

He says two common tricyclics are amitriptylene, the generic name for a drug sold most commonly under the trade name, Elavil; and doxepin, most popularly sold under the name Sinequan. He describes them as "mood elevators" prescribed for people suffering from depression.

Lewman says Oregon's high rate of tricyclic deaths may be part of a national trend. He says the drug is mentioned increasingly by the Drug Abuse Warning Network, an organization that gathers data from medical examiners and coroners.

On cocaine, Lewman says the increase of an estimated 8-10 deaths from direct injections over the past year has been startling because such deaths were extremely rare several years ago.

"That's what's striking," Lewman said of the increase. "Four or five years ago we wouldn't see any."

"Cocaine is a violent, potent central nervous system stimulant, particularly when injected directly into the bloodstream," he says. "It's just an extremely hazardous practice."

All but one cocaine death in the past year was from injection, he says.

Lewman says tricyclic deaths have replaced propoxyphene — commonly sold under the trade name Darvon — as the leading drug killer in Oregon.

"Now it's the No. 1 cause of drug overdoses in the state. We see them alone or in combinations with alcohol and other drugs," Lewman says of the tricyclics. "Many are suicides, some are accidents, and sometimes we can't tell."

He estimates that as many as 48 people have died from tricyclic overdoses in Oregon over the year, based on an estimate of three or four such overdoses a month.

He says definite figures won't be available for this year until late summer or early fall of next year.
