Bands tuned for winter concerts

By Doug Nash
Of the Emerald

Performing groups at the University's Music School are tuning up for a new year of performances wide in variety and low in expense.

Still savoring the experience of last May's Japanese tour, the Wind Ensemble will be performing March 8 in Beall Hall. Appearing with the elite corps will be the Symphonic Band, which gives non-music majors a chance to play in a university-level concert organization. The two groups will accompany solo alto sax player and recording artist Dale Underwood, formerly of the U.S. Navy Band and the Boston Pops.

Professor Wayne Bennet, director of bands, says many non-music majors still find the Symphonic Band too "imposing."

Additional performances include a Feb. 27 date at Beall Hall for the Symphonic Band, and a trip to Fresno April 12 to 19 for the Wind Ensemble, which was invited to play the finale concert at the National Wind Band Symposium.

On the way, Bennet plans to make stops "on both sides of I-5."

As for the string scene, new conductor Marsha Mabrey is excited about the prospects for the 60-piece, highly renowned University Symphony Orchestra.

"We have an orchestra of the quality that can tour and I'm real pleased about that."

And tour they will. Along with the University singers, the orchestra will visit Portland-area high schools February 10 and 11. UO students will get a taste of the tour a day before, when the two groups combine to perform, among other things, Randall Thompson's "Americana" February 9.

A new concept this year, Mabrey says, are the 45-minute, noontime concerts given to Eugene secondary school children the day of the performance.

"It's a preview of what the evening concert will be like," Mabrey explains. "A lot of kids really don't have the opportunities to see a Symphony."
