Reagan campaigns for the MX

ASHLAND, Ohio (AP) — Pres. Ronald Reagan, trying to turn up the heat on skeptical members of Congress, said Monday that failure to build the MX missile would deal a heavier blow to national security than any threat from a foreign power.

In a speech en route to Washington from a long weekend in the West, Reagan urged Congress against slowing down his plans to modernize U.S. strategic forces, build the nuclear-tipped MX and develop a small, single-warhead missile.

"I believe with every fiber of my being that these steps are essential to ensuring arms control progress and our nation's future safety and security," Reagan said.

"Only when the Soviets are convinced that we mean business will arms control agreements become reality. We are not building missiles to fight a war, we are building missiles to preserve the peace."

Congress will vote within the next three weeks whether to build the MX, a huge new intercontinental ballistic missile with 10 warheads. Production funds were deleted by Congress last year, partially because of opposition to Reagan's proposal for basing the MX.

Under Reagan's latest plan, following recommendations by a White House advisory commission, 100 of the missiles would be built and installed in existing Minuteman silos near Cheyenne, Wyo., at an estimated cost of $18 billion.

"If the Congress rejects these proposals it will have dealt a blow to our national security that no foreign power would ever have been able to accomplish," Reagan said Monday.

Seeking to ease the fears of some legislators, Reagan promised a vigorous, simultaneous pursuit of an arms agreement.

After a three-day stay at his ranch in the Santa Ynez mountains of California, Reagan flew to Ohio to help dedicate a library and public affairs center on the campus of Ashland College in honor of the late Rep. John Ashbrook, a prominent Republican conservative who died last year while running for the U.S. Senate.

Reagan praised Ashbrook as a pioneer "of a new conservative movement in America" and said the views he represented could be called "the dominant force in American political and intellectual life."

Kell convicted in car-bombing

EUGENE (AP) — A jury found Michael D. Kell guilty late Monday of aggravated murder in the car-bombing death of Springfield millworker Robert E. Harris.

The verdict was returned about 11 p.m., after six and a half hours of deliberation, in the Lane County Circuit Court of Judge Douglas Spencer.

After arguments closed,

Judge Spencer told jurors they could find Kell innocent or guilty of aggravated murder, manslaughter, or criminally negligent homicide.

Kell's death was "a cold-blooded assassination," prosecutor Brian Barnes said in closing arguments Monday.

The Dec. 2 slaying was not committed in a moment of passion but was carefully planned and carried out, Barnes said.

Defense lawyer Mike Phillips said Kell may have been naive, but was not guilty of participating in Harris' death.

Kell, 20, was accused of aggravated murder as one of three alleged accomplices in the death of Harris.

Also facing aggravated murder charges in the case are Terry White, 32, and Barbara Harris, 31, the victim's wife.

Barnes told the jurors, "Quite frankly the state views this as a case of finding (Kell) guilty of aggravated murder or of nothing. It is an all-or-nothing case."

In concluding testimony Monday, a surprise prosecution witness, Lane County Jail inmate Daniel J. Adams, said Kell confessed taking part in the murder "because of what Mr. Harris did to his daughter."

The prosecution contended that Harris' sexual molestation of his 17-year-old daughter, for which he was convicted of attempted first-degree rape, was a motive for the slaying.

Adams testified Kell made the confession while the two were playing cards about two weeks ago.

Adams said Kell admitted being present when the bomb was wired in Harris' car and said that he, White and Barbara Harris had visited the Rosboro Lumber Co. parking lot several hours before the bomb was set to "make sure the car was parked in the right place."
