

WPPSS legal expenses equal $15 million

SEATTLE (AP) — The Washington Public Power Supply System expects to spend $15 million on legal expenses this year and while members of the system's executive board feel WPPSS is getting its money's worth, they are looking at ways to hold down costs.

Board members were briefed on the supply system's legal expenses last week and suggestions ranged from beefing up WPPSS in-house legal staff to signing contracts with outside legal firms that include specific cost ceilings.

The supply system is currently involved in 66 active cases, said Arlan Lund of the supply system's legal staff. Of those, the supply system is the defendant in 56, he said.

"We are in a reactive stance," said Lund. Twenty-one of the 66 cases involve the supply system's two terminated nuclear power plants, Lund said. WPPSS is spending almost $500,000 a month for its own legal expenses and those of Chemical Bank of New York in a suit aimed at determining whether the 88 utilities that sponsored the abandoned plants will have to pay for them.

The suit was filed by Chemical Bank, bond trustee for the terminated plants, against WPPSS and the utilities. Even though WPPSS was named a defendant in the suit, it is required to pay the bank's legal fees under the bond sale agreements.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, WPPSS will have spent $15 million on legal fees, said Lund. During fiscal 1984, the supply system expects legal services to cost $8.8 million.

Lund estimated that through the end of the decade, WPPSS could spend almost $40 million, with more than $32 million spent on hiring legal firms, accountants and researchers outside the supply system.
