Scientists seek clues to slides

RENO (AP) — Geologists buzzed over the Sierra Nevada by helicopter Tuesday, looking for clues to more mudslides like one which took one life and wiped out four homes at the base of towering Slide Mountain.

A search for survivors of the slide was called off after Washoe County Sheriff Vince Swinney said all were accounted for.

Federal, state and county agencies were surveying the damage caused by the mammoth earthslide, which sent a 15-foot "wall" of water, mud, boulders and debris crashing down a creekbed into the fertile Washoe Valley on Monday.

Four homes were destroyed and five others damaged by the slide, which also trapped a number of horses in its path. One was shot to death because of its injuries and another was accidentally dropped off a gurney as a helicopter tried to lift it to safety. Others were safely evacuated.

Nevada Gov. Richard Bryan toured the site Tuesday and said the damage was not as serious as he expected.

Relief agencies were trying to determine how much assistance the families affected by the disaster would need.

The U.S. Forest Service sent a helicopter over a 90-mile stretch of the Sierra south of Reno to determine whether Monday's slide would be followed by more.

Last winter was the snowiest on record in the Sierra Nevada, and the mountains are still choked with snow drifts of 20 feet or more. Landslides already have closed U.S. Highway 50, the major artery into the Lake Tahoe area, in two places.

Monday's slide was caused by the sun's infrared rays heating the earth below the snow on Slide Mountain, according to Forest Service engineer Max Montgomery.

He said infrared heating caused a cavity to build between the earth and snow, resulting in an avalanche which ripped away earth and trees and sent a roiling layer of muck sliding down the steep face of the mountain.

The mud cascaded into Upper Price Lake, formed a dam and burst it, and then repeated the process at Lower Price Lake directly below.

Fires contained, crews go home

EUGENE (AP) — Cool, rainy weather helped control a number of forest fires in the Willamette National Forest and fire officials said Tuesday they were beginning to send their fire crews home.

"All the fires are controlled except for two in the Detroit District and we expect to have those controlled today," said Betty Hooker, fire dispatcher for the Willamette National Forest.

"We had light rains on the fires yesterday and that's certainly aided us in controlling them," Hooker added.

Mopping up operations were expected to continue through Thursday and fire crews were being demobilized, she said.

"We had 1,400 on the fires yesterday and we're down to about 1,200 today," Hooker said Tuesday. "By Friday we anticipate having only a few crews left."

The two fires not listed as "controlled" Tuesday presented "no problems," she said. They were situated in the Monument Peak and Detroit Reservoir areas.
