Students 'experience' science

University camp inspires high school scientists

A 'bat walk' through Pioneer Cemetery and a weekend at the University's Pine Mountain observatory are two of the activities that are part of the Oregon Summer Science Experience.

The "experience," a science camp held at the University, is a program designed to encourage outstanding high school students to enter science careers. Gordon Murphy, the OSSE director, also hopes the program will entice some of the 24 sophomores and juniors to enroll at the University after they finish high school.

The students spend 10 days exploring current research activities in biology, chemistry, geology, psychology and physics, attending lectures, visiting labs, and interacting with scientists and University science students.

Of the 24 students who participated last summer, the first year of the program, eight students applied for admission to the University this fall, Murphy says. Three of those eight are high school seniors who will attend the University part-time.

The program is "excellent," says Andrene Hyatt, one of the five students who applied for admission.

"They didn't just lecture to us but showed us current research and gave us hands-on experience in labs," she says.

The program provides a good overall view of science rather than one specialized area, says Hyatt, who intends to major in biology.

"Even though I had to write papers and attend lectures, I wasn't pushed into doing it. I did it for myself," says Bettie Witchie. By participating in the program, Witchie says she made new friends, talked to professors and learned about the lab facilities.

"I'm really excited about going to the University (this fall)," she says.

Requirements for the program are a high grade point average, usually 3.75 or better, recommendations from two teachers and an essay about "How I See Science as Part of the Future." Murphy reads the applications and does most of the selecting.
