

certain sort of person to be a secretary. You have to like to do things for people behind the scenes. You have to be thinking ahead to the pitfalls and make sure things don't fall between the cracks."

"She's a marvelous example of a woman who knew what she wanted and set a track for herself," says Jackson.

Leonard has worked for four different University presidents, beginning with Charles Johnson in 1968-69.

Johnson was a "very caring person," she says. At that time, everyone reported to the president, which Johnson found difficult to deal with, she says.

When Robert Clark was selected as president, he asked her to stay on and so did Boyd and Olum. Any of those men could have selected someone else, because the University president is entitled to whoever he wants as secretary.

While working for Clark, she worked with Jackson as well and she began to see the importance of details.

Former University Pres. Bill Boyd was more formal and she did more detail work. For example, she would send him directions when he traveled. Once when he was going to the Sheraton in Portland, she made a mistake, and even though he could see the hotel, he had such faith in her directions that he turned right instead of left. After that incident, she always double and triple checked her directions, she laughs.

Olum doesn't need or want such detailed work. "He does a lot on his own."

"I adapted to the way each president worked," she says.

Jackson applauds her ability to meet the demands of such different men. "She worked for Johnson, Clark, Boyd and Olum — that tells you something about her ability to meet their needs," she says. "It requires adjustment, but Chris is oriented to the team concept. As a team member you learn to be flexible."

Several years ago, Leonard decided she wanted to complete her bachelor's degree, so she took classes at the University, graduating with a bachelor's degree in public administration in 1981.

"It made me see the merits of a broad liberal education," she says. "Going to classes and meeting students keeps you young at heart."

Or, as Jackson sums it up: "She's a real achiever."
