

ACLU supports girl's bid for football team

ROSEBURG — A suit was filed Monday by the American Civil Liberties Union of Oregon on behalf of a 16-year-old Sutherlin girl barred from trying out for her school's football team.

Ellice Stanwick has repeatedly sought to try out for the team. The 5-9 sophomore weighs 168 pounds and threw the shot put, discus and javelin on the freshman track team last year.

The Sutherlin School Board has denied her request, saying that she does not belong on the team because of possible health and safety problems.

But in its suit, the ACLU argues that she is being discriminated against only because she is a girl in a "clear violation of the Oregon Constitution's protection against gender discrimination."

"Ellice Stanwick is not the first girl to try to join a boys' football team," said David Fidanque, Oregon ACLU associate director. "... Other districts in Oregon have allowed girls to play."

He said he hopes the district will reconsider its position "and agree that girls who meet the physical qualifications have the right to play football."

Computer kid instructs Congress in breaking and accessing systems

WASHINGTON — A 17-year-old computer "hacker" who has broken into dozens of computer systems nationwide, including those at Los Alamos National Laboratory and Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, told Congress on Monday how easy and dangerous it was — and how simple it would be to stop it.

"There was no damage, but the potential for damage was enormous," Neal Patrick said of the activities of himself and six computer-literate friends known as the "414s" after the area code of their hometown of Milwaukee, Wis.

At one of their targets, the Sloan-Kettering center in New York, the only sign of the group's prowling was the deletion of one day's billings for a physician.

"If someone with a sinister intent had accessed that computer, the damage could have run into the millions, just in dollar value," said

Patrick, who first became interested in computers during a brief seventh-grade school course on the subject.

But the group's electronic exploration was not difficult, he told a House Science subcommittee. It required only basic knowledge of how computers work, a small home computer and the use of easy-to-guess passwords like "test" or "system" which are part of basic computer programs and which owners frequently neglect to change.

Some of the passwords are available through electronic "bulletin boards," information exchanges that can be dialed up by telephone by anyone with a few hundred dollars' worth of basic equipment.

"If they had just changed those (passwords), we couldn't have gotten in," Patrick told the panel.
