doing anyway at the University — that the corporation believes may lead to progress in running shoes. However, he is not pressured to produce direct applications as many researchers who work for corporations are.

"Most corporations are anxious to have you do their thing," he says. "Tiger wants you to do the type of thing the University prefers you to do."

For the future, Bates hopes to start working on athletic shoes besides running such as football or baseball shoes. The development by Langer Laboratories of sensors that can be placed directly into shoes will make that type of research possible. It will make the testing easier and less expensive than the force platform.

The new Tiger shoe features a shock absorbing and a control device. By having the outer sole made of cushioning material and the inner sole in a harder material to provide control, the shoe can help with both of the major problems of the feet.

ea of Osternig's research. Through working with about 20 athletes and non-athletes, Osternig has been able to determine how muscles react to surgery.

He has also done some work with knee rotation after surgery is done. He worked with 20 post operation subjects after surgery and tested them to see how well the surgery did. Most of his subjects had muscle transplant surgery done, which helps to prevent external rotation, a prime reason for knee surgery.

"We have a better idea as to what happens to muscle function after a specific kind of surgery," says Osternig.

Before Osternig's research was done, the commonly accepted projection for improvement was about 33 percent, a result that was projected through the use of cadavers.

However, Osternig's experiments showed no improvement, but also no impairment. The injured limb could do everything the opposite knee could.
