University, OSU join research programs benefitting business

By Melissa Martin

The University and Oregon State University combined research programs in a way that may benefit corporations.

Called Advanced Science and Technology Institute, the project is funded with $10,000 donated by the Eugene Private Industry Council with the goal of sharing combined research with corporations.

'It's the catalyst for some really nice things that are beginning to happen between the universities," says Richard Hersh, dean of the graduate school and 'This is bound to change the dividual researchers, vice-provost for research.

Hersh sent project floor plans to EPIC last spring. After the approval, 50 faculty. members attended a one-day retreat to discuss the ideas, followed by a three-day seminar in Eugene this month where corporation representatives and faculty made the University'

- Pres. Paul Olum

'Corporations value basic research conducted at universities," Hersh says.

At the seminar, university and corporation resentatives agreed their relationships should be more intimate so industry can know what research is conducted on campuses, Hersh says.

The corporate and university officials recommended the following programs be formed - industrial liason program, multi-client research programs, technical seminars, seminars for corporate executives, cooperative internships and the advanced science and technology institute.

"This is bound to change the feeling of the community about the University," University Pres. Paul Olum said in a press conference Hersh is waiting for feedback from faculty participants before other action is taken.

The officials also discussed financial arrangements and stressed the desire to keep corporations' costs as low as possible.

In one example, the corporation would pay

$5,000 to $10,000 and have direct access to infeeling of the community about while in others corporations would receive patent and licensing privileges. Another plan allows industrial scientists to work on campus with faculty researchers.

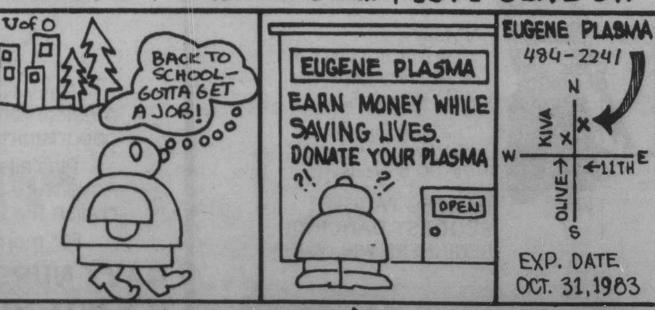

Officials are soliciting additional funds for conferences, brochures, mailings and corporate research facility visits.

Other action will include recruiting a corporate advisory committee to let faculty know industry's research needs and determine university research strengths.

Hersh says the institute is now collecting coporate profiles from particular firms "in anticipation of matching firms in specific industries with the best of University and OSU research."

'By next summer a series of programs will be offered on a continuing basis."
