The silence of western landscape

A landscape print exhibition by photographer Craig Law is featured through October at the Oregon Gallery, the photographic showcase in the University Art Museum. Law, who has lived most of his life in Logan, Utah, has chosen to display photographs dealing with that part of the country. His work is billed as traditional western landscape photography.

"At times I simply am thinking how beautiful something is and make photographs about that beauty," said Law.

In several of the prints man, manmade objects or the consequences of man's intrusion of nature enter into the image. One in particular shows a bluff where graduating classes have spray painted the years of their graduations — vandalism or modern hieroglyphics?

All of the prints are shot horizontally. In most of them the picture is taken straight on, forming horizontal bands across the photograph. There are no strong verticals in the photographs displayed.

Many of the shots evoke subjective feelings. The strange other-worldly quality of mist over a lake, the warm beauty of backlit trees against rolling hills or the juxtaposition of manmade and natural worlds all elicit a response.

The work is filled with the silence of the western landscape.

If you attend the show looking for shock appeal, avantgarde images or gimmicks, this show is not for you. Law's goal is to bring his audience to a heightened perception of common subject matter. He is straightforward in approach and his appeal is broad.

Law, an assistant professor at Utah State University, will give a free lecture at 7:30 p.m., Friday, October 28, in Lawrence Hall, Room 107.
