Library changes user policy

Students can expect several changes at the University Library this fall, foremost being a new circulation policy, says Pat Silvernail, assistant librarian.

All that is needed to charge library material now is a student body card with a validation sticker, instead of requiring a fee card. The University is replacing fee cards with stickers this year.

However, graduate students must prove their status with a certificate of paid tuition if they wish to take advantage of the six month borrowing period they are now allowed. All undergraduates will continue to have a two week borrowing period.

Silvernail says there were several reasons the new circulation policy was devised.

Policies needed to be more consistent throughout the University Library system, and a clear, consistent policy had to be written up as a first step to making the circulation process automated.

The policy will not affect the number of staff members needed at the library, although some retraining has been necessary, Silvernail says.

There is one rule that hasn't changed, however.

Most periodicals continue to be non-circulating, although Science library periodicals may be charged out for short periods of time.

Another change is more pages for students to read. An increased budget for the University Library this year has allowed the library to buy more books, but there is still a need for more equipment — like shelves to put the books on.

Another point Silvernail would like to drive in to students is to remember that they are responsible for material charged to their name, even if they loan it to a friend.

"Never lend a book to a friend if it is charged to your name," she says.
