Business minor available to arts and science majors

By Melissa Martin
Of the Emerald

Students in arts and sciences can now minor in business and increase their chances of getting a job, University Pres. Paul Olum announced in a press conference Wednesday.

The University business school will offer a minor in business next fall and Olum called it "a beginning of a new era."

"We are going to hire more (faculty) in business administration to fit those needs," said Paul Holbo, vice provost for academic affairs.

Business school officials are already searching for new faculty members to start the minor program and improve the quality of the major program, said Richard Steers, associate dean for the college.

Business school and administration officials discussed the idea of a minor about 10 years ago, Holbo said. The University needed a business minor because business classes are traditionally hard to get into — especially for non-majors, Steers said.

"We can offer our students two tracks to get into the business school. It is a dual track into the business world," Steers said.

He said he will not know the requirements for entering the minor program until January, when the University's curriculum committee will have the minor completely designed.

The business minor is expected to require 15 upper division credits, or about five courses, combined with lower division work in economics and accounting.

"The business minor is intended for non-business students who want to gain exposure to the various functional areas of business while at the same time pursuing a major elsewhere on campus," Steers said.

"Students will be able to pursue a major such as history, but also add business skills aimed at improving their job placement possibilities," he added.

Olum also recognized the computer science minor, which began in the summer of 1983. Some 16 students are now part of the minor and one student just completed the program, according to Gene Luks, department head.

The computer science minor requires 28 credits, including 16 upper division credits. Of those 16, 12 must be completed during summer session when the department has sufficient faculty to handle the teaching load.

Olum said in an age of artificial intelligence, the timing is right for the computer science minor.

University Greek adviser decides to leave campus

Marti Chaney, Greek adviser at the University since spring and part of the administration for more than two years, is leaving the campus.

"The thing I will miss most will be the students," Chaney says.

The University will look for two people to fill her position, she says.

Chaney will work part time through November and will probably leave in December.

She became Greek adviser when Dean of Students Robert Bowlin left on sabbatical in the spring. Before that she was Panhellenic adviser.

"Having someone in the administration to represent the Greeks has worked well," she says. "We have established a better and more responsible relationship with the University."

The University will advertise the positions nationally and will look for people with strong backgrounds in working with groups, she says.
