Splatter art

about a recent dinner she had with several people at Cafe Central in Eugene. Hutton was wearing one of the first-made Gemille splattered shirts. A woman seated across from her commented on Hutton's "beautiful top." Hutton smiled and replied, "Oh, thanks. It's a Gemille." The woman smiled pseudo-knowingly back and said, "Oh," as in "Oh, of course."

Cole and Hutton have not yet begun major marketing of their products although one store in Eugene, the Paper Traders Annex in the Fifth Street Market, has recently started carrying the Gemille line. Sue Ryan, who is the clothes buyer at Paper Traders, shares Cole's and Hutton's optimism that Gemille will be successful. "Personally I really like them (the Gemille clothes)," she says. "We're all really impressed."

So, evidently, are the shoppers. In the first few days the items were displayed, six sold and several others were placed on hold. "That's a positive response," says Ryan, adding that usually new things sit for a week or so before anyone buys them. People are attracted to the Gemille clothes Ryan believes, because the garments "aren't crafty, but real professional looking."

Though Gemille has been met with positive response so far, does that mean splatter art is the hottest word in fashionspeak? "People determine what they want," says Hutton. "The public will tell."
