COUNTY COMMISSIONER

Economic development at issue

Improving Lane County's economic growth and courthouse services are the main goals of Lane County Commissioner candidates from south Eugene district 3.

Tonie Nathan, a former community relations assistant for the county, says her main objective is to "diversify, make Lane County a hospitable place for business and development again."

Incumbent Jerry Rust, "has been a major no-growth advocate in the name of environmental protection," says Nathan, an area businesswoman and a freelance writer.

Nathan said she supports all development "as long as it doesn't endanger public health and safety or hurt the taxpayer."

Rust says Lane County must balance a good environment with a healthy economy. "I'm going to protect the wildlife as long as people want me to strike a balance between economic and environmental issues," he said.

Rust, an eight year incumbent, said the county is fiscally and administratively stable. He said the county has 800 staff employees, half of what it had a few years ago, but because the recession has cut the timber industry and left the county budget with $20 million less in general funds, he doesn't expect the staff to increase much in the near future.

Nathan says that Rust does not have a business-like attitude. "We have an economic crisis. What we have to do is change our anti-business image."

As example, she cites the loss of the high-tech Data General plant which would have provided 1,000 jobs.

Rust won a law suit against Data General, which wanted to build on agricultural land.

Businesswoman Barbara Kienlen said the courthouse is the first place outside developers go for information and permits.

Too often, the commissioners sit and say they don't have enough money, instead of trying to find innovative new ways to get things done, Kienlen said.

Instead of seeking outside employers, Lane County Commissioners should focus on improving on what we already have, Candidate Shirley Whitehead says. She suggests improving on livability, by supporting the University and the hospitals.

Whitehead suggests consolidating departments to cut costs. She also advocates taking private bids for county work to increase cost-efficiency as well as hiring an outside firm to administer performance audits on Lane County staff.

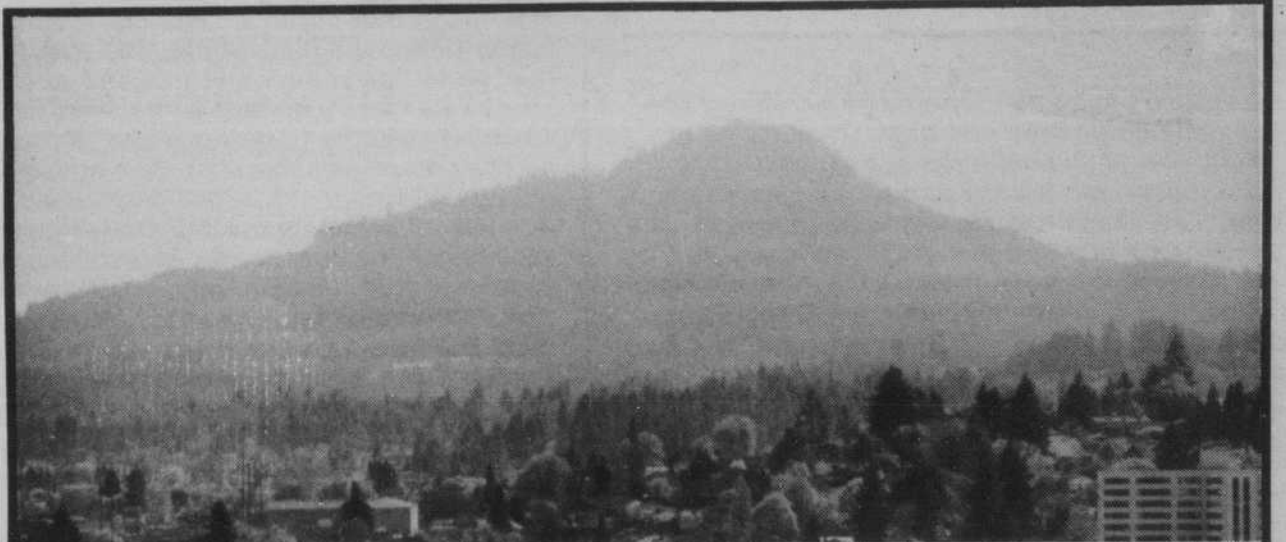

Although many of the candidates support economic development, "The county is limited in its ability to attract industry except to provide good government services," says Jack Craig.

Craig's 16 years of government service include serving as EWEB board member, Lane Transit District Board member and as administrative coordinator in the county Department of Assessment and Taxation.
