NCAA says OSU must return $342,000 in hoop revenue

CORVALLIS (AP) — The National Collegiate Athletic Association has ordered Oregon State to return $342,000 in post-season basketball revenue and remove two basketball scholarships for one year because of NCAA rule violations, the university announced Monday.

The NCAA also placed the university on probation for one year, but did not make the school's teams ineligible for television or post-season playoff appearances.

University Pres. Robert MacVicar revealed the sanctions at a meeting of the school's Board of Intercollegiate Athletics. He said the university would not appeal the ruling.

Most of the violations were in the school's basketball program, MacVicar said.

"Obviously I'm disappointed that the situation ever occurred in the first place," MacVicar said in an interview after the meeting. "But under the circumstances I believe we are being treated fairly."

The $342,000 was the amount of revenue the university earned in its 1982 NCAA tournament appearance.

The NCAA probe uncovered evidence that members of the team sold complimentary tickets during the tournament in violation of NCAA rules.

The school's record of participation in the 1980, 1981 and 1982 NCAA playoffs was ordered deleted. The team lost opening round games in 1980 and 1981, but advanced to the west regional finals in 1982.

MacVicar said he will point out to NCAA officials that some of the $342,000 was passed on to other members of the Pacific 10 Conference under conference regulations.

MacVicar said the dollar loss would have a "substantial" impact upon the athletic department, but he noted the program already is operating in the black.

"We do not have any unpaid obligations and we do have a small reserve," he said.

Davis said there's little chance the other Pac-10 members would return any of the money. "I think they would likely decide that since we are the ones who committed the action, we are the ones who can pay for it," he said.

Head basketball coach Ralph Miller was unavailable for comment. However, he released a prepared statement saying the coaching staff is "particularly pleased that innocent members of the squad were not penalized for the wrongdoings of others, and that those who have already paid the price did not have to do so again."

Three players, including two starters, were ordered by the NCAA to sit out six games last season for selling complimentary tickets.

"The violations in this case occurred in a period from 1979 to 1983 and primarily involved improper arrangements between several basketball team members and outside representatives, related to the purchase of complimentary basketball tickets and the receipt of other prohibited benefits by the involved team members," Frank Remington, chairman of the NCAA Committee on Infractions, said in a prepared statement.

Remington said neither the NCAA nor the Oregon State investigations "indicate that any athletics department staff member was aware of or involved in the serious violations."

However, Remington said the committee determined that the athletes involved in the violations had reason to know they were breaking the rules and that their eligibility could be affected by their actions if discovered.

Athletic Director Dee Andros said the NCAA penalty "was a little more than I expected." Still, he "was really pleased in that it doesn't bother us in the future. It doesn't penalize the young men who are not involved in the infractions."

MacVicar said the NCAA probe showed that any infractions by Oregon State staff members were "trivial."

"They were not a result of a deliberate attempt to evade the rules," he said.

The only allegations against the staff involved transportation of players and, in one case, the bailing out of two athletes from jail by a coach.

MacVicar said it was uncertain whether the two basketball scholarships would be lost in the coming school year or in the 1985-86 year.

Oregon State has seven basketball players on scholarship and five more recruits who will have scholarships starting this fall. Without the NCAA penalty, Oregon State can have 15 basketball players on scholarships.

Remington said about one-third of the serious violations were uncovered by the university and disclosed to the NCAA. The action "clearly demonstrated the institution's commitment to the future compliance with NCAA legislation."

Detroit rips Seattle

DETROIT (AP) — Dave Bergman's triple in the bottom of the eighth broke a 5-5 tie, lifting the Detroit Tigers 7-5 over the Seattle Mariners 7-5 Monday night.

With one out in the Tigers eighth, Rusty Kuntz doubled to chase Ed Vande Berg, 2-2, for Dave Beard, then Bergman tripled in Kuntz.

Lou Whitaker singled Bergman home with an insurance run.

Aurielo Lopez, 4-0, picked up the win in relief, Don Petry started.
