WPPSS emergency exercise too close to a real accident

RICHLAND, Wash. (AP)— An emergency exercise at the Washington Public Power Supply System's No. 2 nuclear power plant turned into the real thing for several hours Wednesday after a "suspicious black substance" was found on two tanks at the plant.

The material, which WPPSS officials feared could be explosive, was eventually found to be fist-sized chunks of electricians' putty.

The putty, also known as duct sealant, was removed by members of the Richland Police Department's bomb squad who were dressed in special protective clothing and used a ladder to climb up the outside of the tanks.

"We just don't take chances," said Gary Petersen, a supply system spokesman.

Petersen said no one is sure how the material got there, how long it had been there or why it hadn't been spotted earlier.

"I assure you we will take every step to investigate whether this is intentional... if it was a hoax," he said. WPPSS along with the Benton County Sheriff's office will conduct the investigation.

"It should not have been there," he said.

Don Mazur, supply system managing director, was asked at a news conference whether security at the plant had failed.

"I'm going to leave that question open until I investigate how it got there," he said. "I'm not mad or upset, I'm ticked off. If it turns out to be people playing games it's going to hurt."

A spokesman for the regional office of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in Walnut Creek, Calif., said the office was informed when an "unusual event" was declared at the plant after the "suspicious substance" was sighted Wednesday morning.

Jim Hanchett said, however, that the NRC played no direct role during the incident.

"If anything it shows a pretty good awareness of security and a good response," Hanchett said.

An "unusual event" is one of four classes of emergencies established by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. An unusual event is the least severe of the categories, relating to "abnormal plant conditions that require notification of state and county officials."

The plant was at 3 percent power when the unusual event was declared.
