EAT LESS STAY HEALTHY
International studies show a wide variation in cancer incidence from one country to another. Studies of migrant populations suggest that nutrition rather than environmental chemicals plays a major role in these differences.
For example, Japanese who migrate to the US have increased breast cancer, but decreased stomach cancer. This is because Americans eat more fat than people in Japan.
Colon cancer also correlates well with fat consumption and it is inversely connected to fiber ingested; eat more fiber and have less chance of getting colon cancer.
The most general protective measure against cancer is reducing calorie intake. Eat less and stay healthy appears to be a good rule of thumb.
The biggest risk factors, though, are smoking and drinking alcohol.
