Seminoles

"I really think there is only one clear favorite and that's Florida State," Crawford says. "We are just one of six or seven teams who will be fighting for second place. If Florida State uses their people to the maximum, they should dominate the 100 through the 400. They have the possibility to score big points in all of those."

But if the Seminoles falter, Tennessee should be looming close behind.

The Volunteers are led by 800-meter runner Joetta Clark, who tops the nation with a time of 2:01.15. Tennessee also has quality in the sprints with Mary Bolden, a freshman who has run an 11.50 100 and 23.51 200. Cathy Rattray, with a best of 52.19, is expected to produce in the 400 and distance runners Alisa Harvey, Alison Quelch and Monica O'Reilly should score a few points in the 1,500, 3,000 and 5,000. Tennessee also possesses one of the finest intermediate hurdlers in the country in Shariieffa Barksdale, who has run a 56.54 this season.

The Volunteers will also score in the field events. Pat Walsh, who has a 184-6 discus throw to her credit this season, is tabbed for a high finish. In the shot Walsh has gone 53-5' and is expected to score there, too.

Tennessee also has two of the finest relay teams in the country. Its 400-meter relay team has clocked a 44.45 this season, fourth best in the country, and its 1,600-meter relay team has gone 3:30.99, which is by far the best in the country.

In addition, senior Myrtle Chester is expected to score in the heptathlon, where her season best is 5,485.

"We do have the potential to score a lot of points because we qualified 16 people for the meet," Crawford says. "But points depend on performance and we'll just have to wait and see how we perform."

Stanford

Stanford University's women's track team, which is usually regarded as a distance running factory, has taken on a new wrinkle this season.

Not only is Stanford deep in the distances this year, but the Cardinal has one of the country's top shot putters and discus throwers and a quality javelin thrower.

The depth in the distances and the quality throwers make Stanford a legitimate threat to challenge for one of the top three spots at the NCAA track and field championships.

"One team could run away with the thing but at this stage of the season luck has a lot to do with it," says Brooks Johnson, the Stanford coach who also will coach the U.S. women's Olympic team this summer. "Anyone could win it. A lot depends on strategy, though, and who wants to double who in what event."

If Johnson decides to load up and double some of his runners, it would definitely enhance the Cardinal's position in the team rankings.

One of Johnson's options will be to run PattiSue Plummer in two events. Plummer is expected to win the 5,000 — in which she has run 15:29.0 — but also could score big points in the 3,000, where her best is 9:04.3. Stanford also has a pair of runners, Alison Wiley (9:09.4, 16:01.5) and Cory Schubert, entered in the 3,000 and both of them could score in the 5,000.

The field events, an area where Stanford used to be fairly weak in, is one of its strong points this season.

For starters, there is Carol Cady, who has tossed the discus 204-10 and the shot put 55-1 this season to rank among the nation's leaders. Cady is picked by Track and Field News to finish second in the shot put and first in the discus. In addition, Stanford also has Mary Osborne in the javelin. Osborne, who is picked fourth, has heaved the spear 183 feet.

"We have the capability to score in a lot of events," says Johnson, whose team has qualified 10 athletes in 20 different events. "But a lot depends on doubling people. And with the Trials right after the NCAA, it will be some tough decisions for some people."

And, with all of Stanford's points expected to come in the distances (46 points, according to T and F News) and weights (43 points), the Cardinal could prove to not have enough depth to catch Florida State or Tennessee.
