Check out the Library

Whether you need the latest copy of the Polk County Itemizer-Observer, an obscure dissertation on molecular biology, or the name of the first chief justice of the Oregon Supreme Court, the University Library is the place to begin your search.

With 1,639,745 circulating volumes, 17,208 periodical subscriptions, and 3,662,508 manuscripts, the eight-branch library should have the answers to your questions. And if it doesn't, the interlibrary loan system provides access to the lending materials of other major academic libraries.

The Main Library, located in the southwest corner of campus, contains the bulk of the University's lending materials. Current periodicals are located on the first floor, and back periodicals are shelved in the stacks on the second and third floors.

The reference desk, interlibrary loan service, and card catalog, which lists most of the materials on file throughout the University library system, are located on the first floor. The newspaper room, with 239 newspapers including all newspapers published in Oregon, is also located on the first floor.

The Douglass listening room, where audiophiles can listen to recorded music, poetry readings and speeches; the government documents depository, home to a variety of national and international government publications; and the instructional media center, which provides the campus faculty with audio-visual hardware and software are also located in the Main Library.

Reference desk personnel offer a guided tour of the Main Library at 1:30 p.m every Wednesday and Thursday for anyone interested in becoming more familiar with the facility.

Each of the other seven branches of the University Library has its own area of academic expertise:

• The Law Library, located in the Law Center, contains research materials for federal and state law. Included in the holdings are records and briefs from the U.S. Supreme Court, State Session Laws for all 50 states, and a large collection of law journals.

• The Architecture and Allied Arts Library, Room 270 of Lawrence Hall, contains books, periodicals, slides, photographs and drawings that serve students studying art, architecture and related fields.

• The Map Library, Room 165 of Condon Hall, houses a collection of 355,282 maps, including atlases and aerial photographs, on virtually every topic imaginable. It is one of the ten largest map libraries in the United States.

• The Science Library, on the lower level beneath Science I and Science II, houses most of the University's collection of science-related holdings, including titles in astronomy, physics, chemistry, geology, paleontology, biology, botany, biochemistry, zoology, and physiology.

 The Mathematics Library, in Room 210 of Fenton Hall, is the place to find the bulk of the University's materials in mathematics and computer science.

• The Bureau of Governmental Research and Service Library, Room 130 of Hendricks Hall, is a depository for information concerning public administration, finance and planning on the state and local levels.

• The Archives, in the west end of Fenton Hall, serves as the University's memory, with photographs and negatives, audio tapes, and other memorabilia recording the University's history since 1872. The Archives are open to the public, but visits must be arranged in advance.
