Professor plans to retire

By Mike Duncan Of the Emerald

Aaron Novick, University professor and director of the Institute of Molecular Biology, will retire this year after a long and varied career in science. His endeavors have included participation in the Manhattan Project of the 1940s, the acquisition of funds that built two of the three science buildings on campus, and the pioneering research in the field of genetic regulation within cells.

From a poor family living in Toledo, Ohio, Novick helped to support his family by working a full-time job while attending school at the age of 15. He soon won a scholarship to the University of Chicago, where he earned bachelor's and doctoral degrees in physical organic chemistry in six years.

Immediately upon graduation in March of 1943, Novick went to work with the Manhattan Project in Chicago. He and his group studied the effects of radiation on reactor components.

In April of 1945, Novick transferred to Los Alamos to participate in the first atomic bomb test. He and his group were to measure the energy release. As part of this duty, Novick entered the crater immediately after the explosion to gather samples.

In terms of exposure to dangerous levels of radiation, Novick explained that "the important consideration is the length of time that one is exposed. If the car that we were driving were to have stalled, I probably would have become very concerned."
