Thomas has been working with theater and circus shows for several years, starting college as a theatre major. His goal is to "make it" in street theater, he says. "I want to travel and perform on the street. You get more feedback right there."

For now, Thomas is majoring in journalism at the University as something to "fall back on," he says. "Most people who start out as theater majors end up as landscape architecture students," he adds.

On the other hand, Miller looks at juggling as just a fun hobby, which started when he was 12.

But juggling isn't Miller's only contribution to the group. With a background in music, he also arranges songs. And being the biggest, Miller holds up Thomas, who is the gymnast and the smallest, in their routines.

But Miller has no professional aspirations in comedy, he says. "If I had to do it as a job, I think it would lose its intrigue."

Glen boasts an extensive history of experience in melodrama and vaudeville plays. After graduating from high school in Colorado, he became opposed to performing other people's material, so he took to the street.

In Eugene, Glen studied improvisation and mime during the past three years. And it was through his juggling that Glen met up with Miller and Thomas, he says.

Diversified talents combined with the members' common interest in politics give a unique twist to the Out 2 Lunch act, Glen says. "My personal goal is to utilize all our skills in our act," he says. It's the goal of the group to "entertain and intrigue the audience as much as we can."
