Students battle arms race

The Student Campaign for Disarmament kicked off its second year of activities with a short organizational meeting Monday night followed by a long session of brainstorming for event ideas.

Fifteen students met in a corner of the EMU to share their personal beliefs regarding the nuclear arms race, to offer their support for the organization and to come up with new ways of increasing student awareness of the group.

Sherri Schultz, the new director of SCD (formerly known as Students for a Nuclear Free Future or SNUFF), said the meeting was a success.

"I'm really pleased with the turnout at our first meeting," Schultz said. She expects the unofficial membership of the group to increase during the year as students become more aware of the group through its "highly visible" activities.

Some of the events SNUFF and SCD engineered last year included the "peace circle," where students silently held hands in a large circle covering the EMU courtyard; a "Die-In," where members staged a nuclear attack and "died" in the courtyard; and a massive "13th Avenue March" down 13th Avenue between the University Bookstore and the EMU during the noon hour.

Members of the organization also were involved in painting the "street graph" on 13th Avenue last spring. The graph showed in brilliant colors what the group claims is the amount the Reagan administration spends on education, government expenses, the military and other areas.

Schultz said SCD plans to hold repeat performances of these events and to continue the nuclear awareness week, arranging for panel discussions and holding informational tables on campus throughout the year. The group will also continue showing campus films, which are already in progress, to raise funds.

"We're not the 'students for a nuclear freeze' or something as simple as that," Schultz says. "Basically people feel the nuclear arms race is unwise, is wasting our resources and is threatening our survival. They want to act on these feelings."

SCD will hold its next meeting Oct. 17 in its office in Suite 1 EMU. For more information on the group, contact Schultz at 686-4248.
